Mr. WARREN. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to enter into anything like a lengthy argument in regard to the proposition before the House. I desire simply to enter my protest against some positions taken by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Mason.] I have no hesitancy, however, in saying that I am opposed to the bill as reported by this committee. But before I give any attention at all to the bill, I desire to notice a suggestion which fell from the lips of that gentleman, simply because I am not willing that a sentiment of such a character should go forth from the Congress of the United States to the people of this country.

The gentleman tells you that, in order to get incompetent, inefficient men into position, it is but necessary to increase the salaries attached to their offices. Now, it has been held in the country from which I hail, and I have understood it to be the policy of the country generally, that if you want to get efficient, competent men to discharge the duties of any position, you must give them something like adequate compensation. That gentleman, however, tells you that, as to positions here, under the Federal Government, if you want to have them filled by inefficient men, you must give them adequate pay—I mean high pay. That is a new doctrine. It may attach to the State of Kentucky, but I am sure it cannot attach to any other place than Kentucky.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? I said “extravagant pay.”

Mr. WARREN. Well, extravagant, if the gentleman prefers it. I hold this to be the truth—and the history of all States and all countries sustains me in the declaration—that the higher the pay, the more efficient officer you can get to discharge the duties. Hence, I hesitate not to announce that, if I had been in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, I would have voted for the bill increasing the compensation of members. Doubtless, if the gentleman from Kentucky had been here, he, too, would have voted for that bill. And yet, sir, while we would increase our pay, and while we are all willing to increase the pay of functionaries of the Government, we would now strike—at whom? Strike at those whose very bread depends upon the little salary they get for the performance of their arduous duties—more arduous duties than we and higher functionaries perform.

Now, if the gentleman is really sincere about this system of retrenchment and reform, I am willing to go with him and other gentlemen in their efforts, and go as far as he who goes furthest. Let him go around and see the committee rooms, and notice the gorgeous manner in which they are furnished. Let him see the clerks employed by committees, at four dollars per day, and not a single thing to do. Let him strike at them, and not at the little boys on this floor, many of whom are sustaining their widowed mothers, and their little orphan brothers and sisters. Strike at a man who is able to live within himself, if you are for retrenchment and reform. But now you strike, by this bill, at those subordinate offices that are filled by poor men, and poor men's children, and widows' children; and some of them are to be turned off, and others to have their salaries reduced so low that they will not be able to pay their board, much less help to support their widowed mothers and orphan brothers and sisters.

Mr. RUFFIN. I wish to remind the gentleman that the committee does not propose to decrease the pay of pages. They propose to leave their salaries at two dollars a day, and, instead of decreasing, to increase their number.

Mr. WARREN. The position I take is right. If gentlemen wish it to go from the American Congress that they are in favor of retrenchment and reform; that they are in favor of strict economy, let them strike at what will pay. Now, sir, suppose that forty or fifty or one hundred thousand dollars would be saved by this bill, what is that in comparison with the enormous amount of money expended by this Government in the payment of various sinecures, and of thousands of officers whom you might possibly call inefficient, and who have been promoted simply because they have been pulled? I say, let us strike at the proper place; let us get up a system of retrenchment and reform. I am as much in favor of that as anybody; but I am in favor of beginning at the right place. Let us strike at game that is worthy of us. The pay given to clerks and messengers and pages is not much in comparison with what we receive. Suppose a bill were introduced reducing the salary of members of the American Congress, would the gentleman have voted for it? Not so.

Mr. RUFFIN. I will.

Mr. WARREN. Well, let the gentleman bring in such a bill. I am glad to see so much patriotism evinced by gentlemen; I have not so much patriotism. I frankly confess that I am proud to represent my constituents on the floor of the American Congress; but if you take away the pay attached to the position, you will take with it such a portion of my patriotism as will force me to return to my constituents in Arkansas, and work again there as an humble citizen as I have been wont to do. But I say, if gentlemen want reform, they ought to commence at head quarters. Let them strike the first blow at members of Congress, and then I will possibly assist them in striking at the small fry, if I may use such a term. But as it is, I shall vote against this bill. I shall vote against any measure that does not propose first to reduce the salaries of higher officers, of those who perform less service. There is no member on this floor who performs as arduous services as many of these clerks do, and even as these little pages do. There is a kind of physical labor which any of us would shrink from performing.

And now, sir, as this is a matter which is to go to the country, a matter out of which political capital is to be made—as there is nothing like a cry of retrenchment and reform for popularity among the masses of the country; as it sounds well in the ears of the dear people to swear in favor of strict economy and retrenchment—I move, for the purpose of giving gentlemen an opportunity of expressing their views on the subject, to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RUFFIN. I propose to make only a few remarks in the discussion of this question. I do not propose to go into the subject of patriotism, or of the service of pages. But I do propose to say something in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Warren] in reference to high pay. It seems to think that it is absolutely necessary we should pay high salaries so as to get persons to fill the offices of messengers about the Hall. Now, I do contend that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Mason] laid down the correct principle on this subject—and that is: that if you give large salaries you will not get the men who are appointed to these messengerships to perform their duties, to attend the committee rooms, sweep them out, make the fires, carry water, and do work of that kind. As the gentleman from Kentucky has well said, there are persons who come here in quest of foreign missions, in quest of consulships, in quest of high offices in the Departments, and not getting them they fall back on messengers' places in the House, but are not going to perform their own duties. The consequence is, that, in many instances, they are not well performed. If this bill reported by the Committee of Accounts is passed, I, for one, have no doubt that we can find a plenty of persons who will be glad to take these places and perform the duties at three dollars per day. When it was the custom to only give them two dollars and fifty cents per day there was no difficulty about it, and the duties were just as well performed as they are now. Since you have adopted the high-salary system, I have never seen a Doorkeeper who would carry out the rules of the House. How is it now? Persons are admitted into this Hall every day, from about the city here, who have no shadow of right, while the Lieutenant-General of the United States, as I understand, was the other day turned back. Sir, I say that the Doorkeeper, and every one under him, ought to enforce the rules rigidly. We have tried the high-salary system and it does not accomplish that object, and now let us try some other system. What reason is there for paying one doorkeeper who stands at that door $1,500 a year, and another, who stands by his side, only $1,200? What justice is there in it? I should like gentlemen to answer that question.

But the gentlemen from Arkansas [Mr. Warren] says, “Start the reform somewhere else.” Why, sir, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to begin anywhere. I will go with the gentleman in his reform to any department of the Government—to high salaries and to low ones. I consider the Democratic party of this country as pledged to reform. As a member of the Committee of Accounts, I am ready to stand up to the recommendation we have made here. I voted against the increase of the pay of members of Congress in the last Congress, and I will vote to reduce it now, if the gentleman will introduce a bill for that purpose. I voted against increasing the pay of the clerks of the Departments, and I will vote now to cut it down to the point where it stood before that increase was made. I think their services were performed then quite as well as they are now.

The gentleman says, “Go to the committee rooms, and see the splendid furniture there.” Sir, with that I have had nothing to do, and know nothing in relation to it. But if he will go down into committee room No. 10, where the Committee of Accounts hold their meetings, he will not see any splendid furniture there. That committee room is furnished with plain, cheap furniture, and nothing more. If other gentlemen have had their committee rooms furnished in a different style, it is their lookout, and not mine.

But the gentleman from Arkansas next presents to this House the argument of sympathy, in reference to the pages. Why, sir, as I suggested to him at the time, we do not propose to decrease the pay of the pages on this floor one cent; but propose that they shall be paid in future the same as they have been paid heretofore—two dollars per day during the session of Congress—and we propose that the number shall be twenty. I think that number is amply sufficient; some gentlemen think it is too great. In relation to this matter, however, I will state that the greatest number of pages ever allowed, I believe, was eighteen. I think it was then reduced to fourteen, and kept at that a number of years. But the system has grown up of members bringing boys upon the floor in addition to the number provided for by law, and of allowing them to remain upon the floor during the session, and then, at the close of the session, offering resolutions to pay them the same per diem and extra compensation as the other pages. At the last session of Congress, the number of these outside pages was increased to eleven, so that instead of having the regular number of pages authorized by the House, there were really twenty-five. And the last day of the session a gentleman got up here and offered a resolution to pay those eleven boys two dollars per day and the same extra compensation as the other pages for the session. The regular number of pages authorized by the House at present is fourteen; but as the Hall is much larger than the old one, and as the cost of some additional pages at two dollars per day is very trifling, and as six more would add to the convenience of the members, we saw no impropriety in fixing the regular number at twenty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to know of the gentleman, if he or the committee has made any calculation, so that he can give the House any estimate of the amount that will be saved to the Government, as between this bill and the existing law?

Mr. RUFFIN. In reply to the question of the gentleman, I have to say that it would be difficult to make any estimate that would approximate to the truth—I suppose fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars. We propose now that there shall be twenty-five messengers, under the Doorkeeper, to be paid three dollars per day. Fourteen out of that twenty-five are permanent officers, and are to work in the folding-room during the recess. The others are temporary, and are to be paid three dollars per day for the session of Congress.

In the same way, four of the laborers are permanent, at $1 50 per day; and the other five are only employed and paid at that rate during the session of Congress. The pages are, of course, paid only during the session of Congress; and the six additional ones will involve very little additional cost, as gentlemen can very easily see by making a calculation.

I wish now, sir, to make some explanation of the bill. It is almost impossible to tell what is the number of employes heretofore authorized to be employed. There is no authority of law for the appointment of many of these officers. They have generally been appointed during some Congress for that Congress; and then the appointment has been kept up. A great many of these offices have been established by some provision incorporated in an appropriation bill. In the last general appropriation bill I find an appropriation for the pay, for instance, of the Doorkeeper, the superintendent of the folding-room, the messenger in charge of the Hall, the superintendent of the document-room, and the assistant superintendent of the document-room; five messengers, at $1,500 each, and eight messengers at $1,200 each. A resolution passed at the commencement of this Congress gives five additional messengers, who, of course, will be paid $1,200 each. We now propose that the Doorkeeper's salary shall remain the same as it has been, for it is a responsible position; we also propose that the superintendent of the folding-room shall receive the same salary as heretofore—$1,800 a year. The messenger in charge of the Hall we class as any other messenger, at a salary of three dollars per day. We class the superintendent of the document-room as a messenger. Heretofore he has received $1,752 a year; and the assistant superintendent has received the same salary. We propose that each of these shall be put upon the same footing with the messengers, and paid three dollars a day: so that the whole number of messengers provided for by the bill is twenty-five—three more than the number now employed. The number of laborers heretofore authorized was three during the session of Congress. The committee which reported early in this session added six to that number, making nine in all. We have concurred in that recommendation.

I wish to direct particular attention to the condition of the folding-room. It is important that it should be understood by the House, because we are as likely to get into difficulties there as in relation to the extra number of messengers. The appropriation for carrying on the folding-room for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, was $7,282 88. Of this amount there has been already expended the sum of $6,479 56; leaving a balance for carrying on the operations of that room, from this time until July next, of $803 32. This account was rendered some time since. We found in the folding-room some twenty-eight folders, at $2 50 a day. The Committee of Accounts having that matter in charge, reduced them in number some weeks ago to four, at $2 50 a day, and two laborers at $1 50 per day to carry books; and provided that the remaining work should be done and paid for by the piece, as had been done, before the plan of employing twelve, fifteen, and twenty-eight men, at $2 50 a day each, had been adopted. These persons have been employed and paid during the recess of Congress, when the duties ought to have been discharged by the messengers of the House; and it is this which has caused the fund for the folding-room to be exhausted.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, proposes to reorganize the matters intrusted to us. We have said nothing about the Speaker's messenger or the Sergeant-at-Arms' employes, because we are not charged with them. This includes every one under the Clerk except what are called the land map clerks.

The employment of these land map clerks is a matter to which I shall more fully call the attention of the House when the proper time arrives. It is a gross imposition upon this Government to keep nine men employed, at over sixteen thousand dollars a year, in the General Land Office, making maps for this House, not worth a red copper. When the Committee on Public Lands makes its report, which will be in a few days, I intend to offer a resolution to abolish this whole force. Their employment has grown up within the last ten years. It is wrong from the beginning to the end. They are of no benefit to anybody but a few land speculators who obtain information from them. The Committee on Public Lands of the last House derived no benefit from their work. Their work does not extend to the Territories; and it is known that the appropriations of land at the last session for railroad purposes were for the Territories.

It is high time, sir, that we should commence with this reform. I am in favor, like my colleague on the committee, [Mr. Mason,] of putting the bill on its passage at once. I want it settled what shall be the number of the employes of the House. If, however, the House is disposed to accede to the request of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. SPINNER,] and refer this bill for amendment to the Committee of the Whole, I do not know that I will have any serious objection to it. All we want is to know how many of these men are to come before the Committee of Accounts. We want the rolls made out in regular form. We want them to be so stated that every member can understand exactly what they mean. We have the right to ask this much of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that we should have some legislation on the subject now under consideration. It is important to determine the compensation of the different employes in and about this building. It is important that we should fix the number of these employes; but it is more important that we should determine the compensation which each one should receive. How is it now? Can you turn to the statute-book and ascertain what any one of the officers of this House is entitled to receive from the Treasury? In 1842, after the memorable contest which resulted in the defeat of the Democratic party and the triumph of the Whig party, the latter party came into this House and created a committee on this subject. That committee took up the subject of the employes of this House, and their compensation. They gave it a thorough investigation. They made a report, specifying the number to be employed, and the compensation of each. And, sir, I believe that so long as the Whig party continued in power, they executed the provisions of the measure they had passed. On the return of the Democratic party to power, there was commenced this uncertain system of increasing offices and salaries in the Capitol. When the Whig party fixed the number of employes and their compensation, they also provided that there should be no extra compensation voted by the Senate or the House. They made this provision in the law, and in one of the rules of the House. Soon afterwards, at the end of a session, the rule would be suspended, and extra compensation voted to the clerks, messengers, &c. A bill was passed, giving twenty per cent. to the employes of the House and Senate upon the amount of their salaries, where the twenty per cent. would exceed $200; and where the twenty per cent. would not amount to $200, by some rule or other, $200 was given to each of this class. In some cases the extra compensation actually amounted to more than the compensation which the employes received under the law for their services.

At that time, sir, the number of clerks was fixed by law; but in the progress of time, when all the clerkships were filled and there were not quite enough to supply the demand, a messenger would be appointed to discharge the duties of a clerk; and, at the end of the session, it would be said, "why, certainly you will not receive that gentleman's services as a clerk for a messenger's pay;" and the House would give him, at the end of the session, the salary of a clerk. And then the Clerk of the House, regarding that as authority to appoint an additional clerk, would go on and appoint one under that resolution, and an appropriation would be made in the general appropriation bill to give him the salary of a clerk. Thus, sir, when you now want to ascertain under what laws the officers of this House appoint their assistants, you have to go to the Journals of the House to find the resolution under which a clerk has been paid, or an additional messenger, or an additional page, has been paid; and those resolutions are construed as authority to continue the employment of all such persons until otherwise ordered. The object of the bill now before the House is to fix and determine the number of employes, and also their compensation.

Mr. Speaker, I think, myself, that the committee have reported a very liberal bill, both as to the number of employes, and as to the compensation they are to receive. I think that you could get competent officers and competent assistants for even less than the committee have reported. But, sir, if a majority of the House think that the committee have not been sufficiently liberal, that the compensation which they propose is not sufficient, let them amend this bill, or take the substitute proposed by the minority of the committee; but let them pass a bill to fix the compensation of all these officers, even though they fix it at double what the committee propose to fix it at. I shall not vote for any such bill, but if a majority of the House think that the compensation proposed is not sufficient, in the name of common honesty and common justice, fix it at what you think is right. Pass a law and cut off all this latter-day legislation. Under the present system no proposition is made during a whole session of eight or nine months to increase the number of officers, or to increase their compensation, but in the last hours of the session, when banquets have been prepared and kept ready for days and nights in rooms about this Capitol, to which members have resorted, and have eaten and drank, I believe, without money and without price, then propositions are brought in here and passed to give extra pay, and to give pay to persons who have been employed about the building without authority of law. I believe that in many cases which have occurred, but few of those who acted upon those propositions really knew the effect of those propositions. Sir, I will refer to some of the propositions of this kind which were passed at the last session; and it is to protect the House against itself in the last days of the session, that I think they should pass a law defining the number of employes, and prescribing the amount of compensation. I read now from the Congressional Globe of the 2d of March last:

"Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the general consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which has been usual at the close of our sessions, in regard to the clerks and employes of this body."

"Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for the regular order of business."

"Mr. DUNN. I presume that all know, who are at all conversant with the compensation of persons in the employ of the Government, that there is no class of public servants who are harder worked, and less paid. I hope no gentleman will object to the resolution."

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business."

"Mr. DUNN. If objection is made, I move to suspend the rules."

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects."

"Mr. DUNN. I move to suspend the rules; and I ask that the resolution be read."

"The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House a like amount of additional compensation to the same officers, clerks, messengers, and other employes of the House, and others, as was directed to be paid at the first session of the present Congress by the resolution of the House of August 15, 1856."

Now, sir, I ask gentlemen of this House if they know how much was proposed to be added by that resolution to the compensation of the employes of the House? But the report goes on:

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules."

"Mr. HUGSTON. Will the gentleman from Indiana accept an amendment?"

"Mr. HOUTSON. I object. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays."

"Tellers were not ordered."

"Mr. STANTON. Will it be in order to have the names of those who vote for the yeas and nays recorded?"

"The SPEAKER. It is not in order."

"The question was taken on Mr. DUNN's motion; and there were, on a division—yeas 131, nays 24."

"So (more than two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended; and the resolution was introduced."

"Mr. DUNN. I move the previous question on the resolution."

"Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call, to allow me to amend the resolution. There are five or six pages here for whose payment no provision is made—"

"The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order."

"Mr. DUNN. I consent that the resolution may be modified so as to include these extra pages."

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The resolution cannot be modified after the rules have been suspended. That is not the question before the House for which the rules were suspended."

"The SPEAKER. The rules having been suspended for the consideration of the resolution, it cannot be modified by the gentleman from Indiana."

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 58.

"The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays on that resolution; but before that question is put, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

"The motion was not agreed to.

"The yeas and nays were not ordered, (only fourteen members voting therefor.)

"The question was taken on the resolution; and there were, on a division—yeas 116, noes 29.

"So the resolution was adopted.

"Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to."

That resolution proposed to give to your Clerk twenty per cent. upon a salary of $3,600; it proposed to give to your Sergeant-at-Arms, to your Postmaster, and to your Doorkeeper and two or three of the clerks at the desk, twenty per cent. on salaries of $2,160; it proposed to give to other clerks, to your Librarian, and the superintendents of the document-room and folding-room, twenty per cent. of $1,800.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that the bill giving extra pay to employés in the last Congress is not now before the House for consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am showing reasons why this bill should be passed, and that is legitimate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee is in order. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee as showing the necessity for the passage of the bill defining the salaries of officers of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the Speaker will bear me testimony that, although I may have the appearance of trespassing on the House frequently, I never attempt to make speeches unless I think they have some relevancy to the subject under consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I wish to justify my call to order, from the fact that we have now a bill and substitute before the House for consideration, and it can certainly not be material to the House to know what the last Congress or any previous Congress did, in allowing compensation or extra compensation. Therefore, as we are spending much time on this very trivial matter, at a sacrifice of more important business of the country, I certainly think that gentlemen ought to be confined to the point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A call to order is not debatable; and this has been already decided by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Tennessee is strictly in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is one resolution; and although the money may not have been paid out at the Treasury, or may not have been passed in the Clerk's accounts, because the resolution is in conflict with the law passed by Congress prohibiting either House from giving this extra compensation, yet it shows what this House thought it had done. And, sir, I suppose that there will be an attempt to appropriate the thirty or forty thousand dollars, granted by this resolution, before the termination of the present session. That, sir, is one of the propositions of the last days of last session.

Here is another, introduced on the 3d of March—the Congress terminating on the 4th, at twelve o'clock:

"Mr. MOORE asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, to J. C. Walker, its reading clerk, for his past services, and until otherwise ordered, a sum sufficient to make his regular annual salary equal to that now received by the reading clerk of the Senate.

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. The compensation of these clerks is fixed by law, and the House has already given them extra compensation.

"Mr. MOORE. I move to suspend the rules.

"The question was taken; and the rules were suspended."

I believe, sir, that when the person named in that resolution was first employed here, it was as a messenger, at $2 50 a day. He was employed by the then Clerk of the House to read; and at the end of the session a resolution was passed giving him the salary of a clerk; that salary has been continued from that time till this—although I believe there is no authority for it other than this resolution—and has been included in the appropriation bills. What was the salary then?—$1,500. But now, when it has gone up to $1,800, here is a resolution offered, not only to increase the salary of that clerk for last session, but to go back to the time when he commenced his service in this House as a clerk at $1,500 a year, and to pay him from that time, and until otherwise ordered, $2,160 per annum; which is the compensation of the clerk in the Senate, whose salary is referred to in the resolution.

Now, what was the amount claimed under that resolution? Mr. Walker's receipt to the Clerk of the House, as presented to the Treasury for settlement, was for $1,748 67, going back some eight or ten years; going back after the salary had been increased twenty per cent. permanently. And this was to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. Was it a contingency?

Here, sir, I am not arguing or trying to show what the compensation of any one of these employés should be. I am only contending that their compensation should be fixed by law at whatever figure a majority of the people's representatives think it should be. Let the law fix the salaries, and I will vote cheerfully to pay them.

Well, sir, to this resolution Mr. Trafton offered the following amendment:

"And that the Clerk be directed to pay to Henry Douglass, for the period he was paid, $1 50 per day, in consideration of his additional services as laborer, and in accordance with the resolutions of the House of May 4, 1846."

This Henry Douglass, I believe, was one of the laborers who had been for years employed by the House, and who had received his pay—for how many years I do not know. But here is a resolution proposing to go back, and to pay him an additional dollar and a half a day, for the time for which he had been already paid. Then, I say again, fix the number of laborers and their compensation.

"Mr. COLFAX. Every gentleman here can testify to the qualifications of our Journal clerk. I move to amend the resolution, so as to put him upon an equal footing with the Journal clerk of the Senate, by adding the following:

"And to John M. Barclay, its Journal clerk, what will make his regular annual compensation for his past services, and until otherwise ordered, equal to that now paid to the chief clerk under the Secretary of the Senate.

"Mr. MOORE. I now demand the previous question.

"The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

"The amendments were agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted."

The amendments were agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, adopted. Well, sir, now let us see what is the effect of the resolution in regard to the Journal clerk. I am not speaking of the individual in that position, but of the compensation affixed to that position. I believe, sir, that some ten years ago, when the present incumbent first entered upon the discharge of the duties of that position, the salary was $1,500 per year. It was afterwards increased to $1,800, and subsequently to $2,160, at which it stood when this resolution was passed.

But, sir, it will be seen, by the wording of the resolution, that it carries with it back pay for ten years. It dates back to December, 1847. You have thus increased the salary of the Journal clerk from what it was in 1847, to that of the chief clerk in the Senate in 1857. The salary, as I have stated, was $1,500 in 1847, and the salary of the chief clerk in the Senate was $2,500. Then this resolution goes back to 1847, and gives the Journal clerk of the House $2,500 a year, from 1847 up to the time of the passage of the resolution, including the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and until otherwise ordered. The claim presented and receipted for in the office of the Clerk of the House, and the receipt presented at the Treasury, was for $5,760 97.

Now, sir, gentlemen understand very well under what circumstances these resolutions were passed. The House had been in session all night. They had been in continuous session for thirty hours. Otherwise, how many men do you suppose, understanding the effect of the resolution, would have voted to suspend the rules, or for the previous question upon the resolution?

Now, sir, if the House, by legitimate legislation, will say that it is right to pay the officer who keeps the Journal $2,500 a year, I say amen to it, and will appropriate the money to pay the salary. If they say $5,000 a year, I will vote the money to pay it, when it shall have been first provided by law that that shall be the amount.

But, sir, these accounts have not been and cannot be paid at the Treasury, the accounting officers say, without a violation of a law upon the statute-book which they cannot disregard; and therefore they have been suspended and cannot be paid, I presume, without a special law making the appropriation.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. I agree with him that there ought to be a law to protect the House against the passage of such resolutions as he has referred to; and in his remarks which he submitted, regarding it as a great outrage. But the point I desire to call his attention to is this: will the bill proposed by the Committee of Accounts protect us from the passage of just such resolutions as he has referred to at the close of each session of Congress?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it would, beyond question; because, when you have fixed by law the compensation of those officers and employés, then, when their accounts are presented at the Treasury, the accounting officers will look at the law, and see whether they are authorized by law. But if there is any doubt upon the question, it is easy to incorporate a clause there prohibiting the voting any extra compensation where a regular compensation is provided by law.

Mr. BURNETT. My recollection is, that there was a law passed in 1854, the object of which was to protect the House against the passage of these resolutions giving extra compensation. But that law has been violated almost every session since, by the passage of resolutions giving extra compensation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the gentleman will find that the law or joint resolution to which he refers does not cover the character of cases I have been referring to. It covers the first resolution which I read, giving the usual extra compensation to the clerks, messengers, pages, and employés about the Capitol. If the gentleman will look to the law passed on the 20th of July, 1854, he will find that it provides that the salaries of these officers and employés about the House and Capitol shall be permanently increased by the amount of usual extra compensation, which was twenty per cent., with a proviso, however—

Mr. NICHOLS. I will ask the gentleman whether, in the cases of Mr. Walker and Mr. Barclay, just commented on, the Secretary of the Treasury has not recommended to Congress that these resolutions be paid, and whether payment was not suspended on the same principle that arrested the payment of the other extras?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has suspended this increase of salaries of the officers last referred to, on the ground of a proviso to an old appropriation bill. But the law of 1854, to which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Mason] referred, increasing the compensation of the employés of this House twenty per cent., provides that such of them as have received the benefits of the act, shall not hereafter receive the usual extra compensation. Those who would get as much, by taking the permanent increase of twenty per cent., as the extra compensation would be, took the twenty per cent.; and those who would not get as much as the extra compensation declined to take the twenty per cent., and took the usual extra compensation.

There is another resolution which caused a good deal of objection at the time. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to William Judge the usual extra compensation allowed to laborers of the House; that the Clerk of this House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund to Daniel Buck the sum of $360 for each session of Congress that he has or shall collate, make out, and prepare for publication the list of appropriations made, new offices created, &c., as required by the act approved July 6, 1836; and that Phin. B. Tompkins, tally-clerk and assistant reader, be paid for his service during this Congress, and until otherwise ordered, the same compensation which the reading clerk receives or shall receive under any resolution of this House; that the clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, the same per diem and extra compensation allowed other clerks to standing committees of the House of Representatives, during the time employed by said committee for this Congress; that the Committee of Accounts be directed to examine the account of B. F. Hall for services rendered by order of this House, and if anything shall be found due him the same shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House."

This was a resolution embracing many provisions. Let us look at one of them:

"That the Clerk of this House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund to Daniel Buck, the sum of $360 for each session of Congress that he has, or shall, collate, make out, and prepare for publication, the list of appropriations made, new offices created, &c., as required by the act approved July 6, 1836."

The Clerk of the House, under that law, was required to have made out at the end of each session, a list of the appropriations made at that session, the new offices created, with the salaries attached to them, and of those offices the salaries of which were increased during the session. This was very easy of performance. The appropriation acts had only to be taken up, and the clauses embracing the matter desired had only to be marked and sent to the printer. In the instance of the appropriation of $1,900,000 for mileage, per diem, &c., of members of Congress, the amount had only to be extended out; and this is the service which Mr. Buck had been performing for years. He was getting a salary of $1,800. This clause of the resolution I have read proposed to give him, in addition to that salary, $360 every year he had performed this service which was required of the Clerk, and every year he should perform it. What was the sum, in gross, voted to Mr. Buck? Four thousand three hundred and twenty dollars. His receipt for that amount was presented at the Treasury Department and payment refused by the auditing officer, because the law did not authorize any such appropriation. Let these things take the form and body of law, and you will no longer hear of such appropriations being refused allowance at the Treasury by the auditing or accounting officers.

The resolution covers many other cases; but I have not time to refer to each one of them.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] was eloquent in behalf of the pages. I think we can get just as competent pages for two dollars, as those we have here now. My experience satisfies me that we have always had more of them than was necessary. How many had we at the last session? There were fourteen recognized by resolutions of the House, and they were paid two dollars a day, each. And the pages were a class of employes who did not accept of the twenty per cent. increase under the joint resolution of 1854, because under the extra compensation resolution they were in the habit of receiving $200 each as extra compensation at the end of each session, and the twenty per cent. would not amount to that much by a great deal. They reserved the right to take the usual extra compensation. That was granted to them; and, if I mistake not, it was allowed at the Treasury Department on that ground.

Here is another resolution about pages:

"Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Samuel Miller, Richard K. Evans, George Hewett, Frank Dufour, Thomas P. Graham, Charles P. Hopkins, William M. Clarke, Edmund Burke, James H. Souder, George Miller, and Moena G. Porter, extra pages, the sum of two dollars each, per day, from the commencement to the close of the present session of Congress, with the extra compensation allowed by the House to the other pages thereof."

That resolution was to pay at the rate of two dollars a day eleven extra pages, brought into the Hall at the first of the session, and continued there without authority, or without any resolution or money appropriated to pay them: their compensation. That made the number of pages employed last session twenty-five. This resolution gave them two dollars a day during the session, which, I believe, lasted ninety-three days, which would make $186; and the same resolution gave them $200 extra compensation. Now, if the House thinks that this number is right, or that a larger number is necessary, let them so provide by law. Let your law fix the number, and fix the compensation, and then cut off all this extra compensation. That is what I think is demanded. Your Committee of Ways and Means, when they come to report an appropriation bill, should know how many employes are authorized, what amount of compensation they are entitled to under the law, and what amount it is necessary to appropriate in order to pay them. I hold that these, sir, are not, properly speaking, contingencies of the House. Contingencies are such expenditures as cannot be anticipated, or which you cannot make specific appropriations in your laws to meet. They are such expenses as cannot be foreseen. But here is another case:

"Mr. PENNINGTON. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution, which is necessary to give construction to the resolution giving extra compensation to the employes of the House. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That the resolutions of the House during the present Congress, giving the usual extra compensation to its employes, be construed, as heretofore, to include the reporters of the House.

"Mr. McMULLIN. I would ask the gentleman if the reporters of the House have not already been provided for?

"Mr. PENNINGTON. No, sir; and the object of this resolution is to construe the compensation resolution so as to give them the extra compensation.

"Mr. McMULLIN. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if the reporters have not already had $800 appropriated for them in one of the appropriation bills? If that be so, of course I cannot vote for this resolution.

"Mr. PENNINGTON moved the previous question.

"Mr. McMULLIN. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has just answered my question in the affirmative.

"Mr. THORNTON. I object to this discussion.

"Mr. McMULLIN. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if we have not already voted the reporters $800 over and above what they receive from Mr. Rives? If we have, of course this House will not pass this resolution.

"Mr. PENNINGTON. It is true that the House allows $800 a year to the reporters. That allowance has been made for several years in succession, and is considered as a part of their regular compensation. This resolution is to give them the same extra that we give to the other officers of the House. I move the previous question.

"Mr. PERRY. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to withdraw the demand for the previous question to allow me to offer an amendment, so as to include the chief clerk in the Globe office.

"Mr. PENNINGTON. I cannot withdraw it.

"The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

"Mr. McMULLIN. I call for tellers on the resolution.

"Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRINGLE and BROOM were appointed.

"Mr. LETCHER. Have the rules been suspended to allow this resolution to come in?

"The SPEAKER. The Chair understood there was no objection.

"Mr. LETCHER. My colleague [Mr. McMULLIN] was objecting all the while.

"The SPEAKER. The question will be submitted, then, on suspending the rules.

"The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-one, noes not counted.

"So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended."

In that case, the rules were not suspended, but an appropriation had been made in one of the appropriation bills of an amount sufficient to pay $800 to each one of these reporters, that bill became a law, and under it the money was paid over. Now, if you will provide for whatever compensation you think is right and proper, embody it in a law, let it pass both Houses and receive the sanction of the President, then it will be right and proper that it should be paid, no matter what the amount may be. I contend that it is important and necessary that we should pass some law upon the subject so that we may know how many employes we have and what compensation they are to receive.

I would make one remark here, sir, in answer to a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN.] The gentleman says that in his country the rule is that, the larger the compensation the greater the certainty of getting a competent man to discharge the duties of an office. That may be, sir, in many cases. But I take it that you can get men who will discharge the duties of many of the persons employed about this Hall as faithfully, as promptly, and as efficiently for the compensation provided by the bill reported by the Committee of Accounts, and now before the House, as you can if you give them $5,000 each, a year.

Mr. Speaker, there is such a thing as giving a compensation for a certain position which is beyond the services required; and men will seek those positions because of the compensation who would feel themselves humbled, if not degraded, in performing the duties required of them. I, sir, would have this Government pay a fair, adequate, liberal compensation for all public services that may be required; but I am opposed, as I ever expect to be, though I may stand solitary and alone, to the creation of what I believe to be unnecessary offices, or to the giving of what I believe to be extravagant salaries, far beyond what will command the services of competent, qualified, and faithful persons to discharge the duties.

Mr. SEARING. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish it to be understood that, in offering a substitute for the bill now pending, I am opposed to economy in the expenditures of the Government. But this bill contemplates the cutting down of the salaries of all the assistant doorkeepers now in the employ of this House; and I, for one, am not prepared to vote to cut down the salaries of gentlemen who have come from every portion of the country and accepted positions as assistant doorkeepers of this House, in the expectation that they would receive the salaries already fixed by law. It may be that if these men had known that their salaries were to be reduced, they would never have accepted the positions at all; and I do not believe that, if it had been known that the House was going to take such a step as the one now proposed, half of them would have accepted the positions they hold under the Doorkeeper. The majority bill proposes to reduce the salaries of these officers—five of which are $1,500, and the residue $1,200—to three dollars a day to a certain number, and to fix the pay of the residue at three dollars a day for the session only. That is one of the principal objections I have to the bill reported by the majority of the committee. The bill which I offer as a substitute proposes to increase some grades of salaries. It proposes to increase the salary of the chief clerk from $2,160 to $2,500. Now, I am told that by resolution this officer already receives, in point of fact, that sum, through the percentage which he receives as disbursing officer, and I desire only to fix that salary so as to make it equivalent to what is now paid him. It proposes to increase the salary of the file clerk from $2,160 to $2,500. These salaries are the same in amount as those received by similar officers in the Senate; and I am confident that the duties of our officers are quite as arduous, and as well performed, as are those of the officers of the Senate. I desire to offer the following as a substitute for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman to amend cannot be entertained, inasmuch as there is pending a motion to commit, made by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN.]

Mr. MASON. There was another amendment, offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SPINNER.]

The SPEAKER. That is pending. If the motion to commit be withdrawn, the amendment can be received, and that motion renewed.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that my object in making that motion was to get this bill before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where amendments can be offered to it. I will withdraw the motion to commit, if the gentleman promise to renew it.

Mr. SEARING. I will renew it; and now I offer this as a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That the officers of the House of Representatives, hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and hereby are, entitled to receive, in lieu of their compensations as fixed by law, the following sums—that is to say:

The Clerk of the House of Representatives, $3,600 per annum.

The chief clerk, the Journal clerk, and the clerk in charge of the files of the office and of the House of Representatives, each $2,500 per annum.

The reading and assistant reading clerk, and the clerk in charge of the printing, each $2,160 per annum.

The nine assistant clerks, $1,850 each per annum.

The chief messenger in the Clerk's office, $1,500 per annum.

The messenger in the library to the Hall of the House of Representatives, $1,500.

The five assistant messengers, each $1,300 per annum.

One laborer, $750 per annum.

One assistant laborer, $600 per annum.

Two laborers at $50 per month during the session.

Sec. 2. And he further enacted, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall be, and hereby is, entitled to receive $2,160 per annum; the assistant doorkeeper, $1,750 per annum; five messengers, each $1,500 per annum; fifteen messengers, each $1,200 per annum; superintendent and assistant superintendent of the document room, each $1,750 per annum; superintendent of the folding room, $1,800 per annum; assistant in the folding room, $1,500 per annum; four laborers, each $600 per annum; four laborers, at $50 per month during the session; and twenty pages, between the ages of ten and sixteen years, each at $2 per day during the session: Provided, That the messengers of the House of Representatives shall, during the recess of Congress, be liable to perform labor in the folding room of the House.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster of the House of Representatives shall be, and he is hereby is, entitled to receive $2,160 per annum; the assistant in the post office, $1,750 per annum; four messengers, each $1,500 per annum; three mail boys, each $900 per annum; two mail boys, each $50 per month during the session of Congress.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ two clerks at a salary of $1,800 per annum, each, to continue the alphabetical index of private claims: Provided, That such clerks shall be employed only for such time as may be actually required to complete the work to the close of the present Congress.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ in the folding-room, during the session of Congress, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts of the House of Representatives, such number of folders, not to exceed twenty-five in number, as may be deemed necessary to perform the work, at a compensation not to exceed $2 50 per day; and also, that he may employ, under the direction of the said committee, two horses during the session of Congress, and that he may receive a suitable allowance for expenses in sending messages and dispatches by messengers and pages.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the messengers employed in the post office of the House of Representatives shall each furnish a horse and carry-all at a price not exceeding two dollars per day.

Mr. SEARING. I hold that we have literally made a compact with these men, holding the position of messengers, at a certain fixed rate; and that we are bound, in common honesty, to allow them to be recipients of that compensation, at least during the present session. I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN,] who told the House that, if we are to begin a system of reformation in the expenses of the Government, we should begin at a point where we could make important savings. Let us aim at higher game than the clerks and messengers of the House, and those holding other subordinate positions around it. It is scarcely a year since the salary of every member of the House was raised; and I have not heard, during the present winter, a single objection, on the part of a member of this House, to his being the recipient of that increased compensation. I believe that all are well content with it. Therefore, I desire that, in all common honesty, those men, who are here in the discharge of their duty as clerks, or other employes of the House, may retain their salaries at least during the present Congress.

I now renew the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I want to define my position in regard to this matter. I want to say that I will go as far as any gentleman on this floor in reducing the expenses of the Government. Sir, I will not commence upon the pages, clerks, and employes around this Capitol.

Mr. RUFFIN. I want to say that this bill does not reduce the pay of the pages one cent.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I understand that; but they are included in the bill. The bill, as I understand it, is to affect the salaries of all the men who are connected with this House. I do not believe in the policy of commencing the work of retrenchment in the expenses of the Government in that branch of the public service.

I do not concur with the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, [Mr. MASON,] nor with the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUFFIN,] in regard to the difficulties which arise from giving high salaries. If I understood them, they argued that, to fix high salaries, brings men here from a distance, who are appointed and paid for work which they do not perform. Well, sir, that is not the fault of the law, but it is the fault of the head of the department having the matter in charge. I would censure any officer of this House who would give an appointment to such men. Employments should be given to men who come here to work, and who feel an interest in the prosperity and welfare of the country. And, sir, when they come here and perform a service, they should be paid for that service. They should be paid in the same proportion with the members of the House and the clerks in other departments of the Government. From the knowledge I have of the duties performed, and the compensation paid the clerks and officers in the various departments of Government, they receive a higher compensation, in consideration of the work done, than the clerks and messengers of this House, under any law regulating their pay. This I believe; and I believe an examination will prove these facts to be correct.

Now, sir, I conceive that it is the province of the committee which reported this bill, when they state to this House that we pay our clerks and messengers here higher for the service performed than is paid any other officers of the Government, to state the facts upon which they base their statement. Whenever they shall present facts which will show that, I will vote for reducing the salaries of the pages, messengers, and clerks. Until I am convinced of that fact, I will not vote for such a reduction. How could I go home to my constituents and acknowledge that I am receiving double the compensation I received when I had the honor of representing the people of my district in Congress some years ago, while at the same time I voted to reduce the pay of the laborer who works as many hours a day as we do, and many of them more.

I say again, I am for retrenchment and reform, but I want to begin at the right place. I want, when that reform is made, that it shall extend to all branches of Government. I do not want it said that we have reduced the expenses some few thousand dollars by cutting down the salaries of our officers—clerks and messengers—while we are throwing out money by millions broadcast over the land, upon the merest pretext, and while there is danger that we shall corrupt and injure the country by the profuse and lavish manner in which we have expended it.

I shall vote for referring this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and there let it undergo a rigid examination. If it shall be found that there are officers who are not needed, I am for striking them off, for I do not like drones. If there is one who is not needed, I will vote for turning him off and dispensing with his services. I am for an honest, fair, and equitable reform, and I will go as far as any member of this House in accomplishing it.

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not propose to consume the time of the House for more than five or ten minutes in the discussion of this question, nor do I wish to enter into a full discussion of the merits of the particular bill before us. During the past Congress it was my good fortune, or misfortune, to be somewhat intimately connected with the organization of this House through its employes, as a member of the Committee of Accounts, and I state from the knowledge which I obtained, that in some branches of its organization it is highly necessary that some limitation should be fixed by law to the number of employes which the respective officers of the House shall have the right to employ. I believe, during the last Congress, in reference to one or two which the Committee of Accounts had control over, I had the honor to move resolutions and secure their passage, for discharging supernumeraries. I say, sir, that a limit ought to be placed, and carefully placed, upon the discretion which officers of this House have heretofore exercised. And I believe that the clause of the bill which gives the Committee of Accounts the right to authorize the number of employes in certain parts of the organization of the House, is right and proper, and ought to pass.

When the Thirty-Fourth Congress entered upon its session there was no necessity, in the folding-room, for the employment of any more men than are now employed under the authority of the Committee of Accounts. For the first four months I believe there was no necessity for more men there than are authorized by this bill; but you will recollect that, after four or five months of the session had expired, we entered upon an excited political campaign; and gentlemen here know, as well as I, how all political parties crowded their documents into the folding-room, creating a necessity for a large additional force. More than four fifths of those documents were for political purposes purely. There was no let up at all; there was no escape. The Committee of Accounts, from the pressure brought to bear upon them from all parts of the House, were compelled to authorize a large additional force to be employed. But I protest against the temporary act of any committee being construed into any authority to employ officers which are not necessary under the present organization. I think that portion of the bill which more fully gives to the Committee of Accounts the control of this department is just and proper, and ought to be passed by the House.

I propose to state my own experience. I have been here for the best portion of five years. During the first session I had the honor to occupy a seat upon the floor of the House, I found the members of this body and of the Senate disposed to increase the salaries of the clerks. They did increase them. At the next session Congress, you will recollect, increased the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. At the next session they increased the pay of the rank and file of the Army and the pay of the Navy. And at the last session of Congress the pay of another useful branch of the Government was also increased, and not improperly. I say in respect to the measure pending, that I do not believe that a decrease of the salaries of the necessary employes of the House is at all necessary. If you pass this bill, it is limited, in its direct effect, to men who have been employed by this body, and it reaches nowhere else. If it be the desire of the House, Mr. Speaker, to inaugurate a general system of restriction of the number of employes of all the departments, and to decrease their salaries—a general system instead of a measure providing only for one department—then the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is a proper one. When such a bill is perfected in committee, let it extend its provisions to all who are receiving salaries under the Government, and let us meet the question like free and independent Representatives of the people. Let us consider and act on all the interests involved with justice and equality. If the proposition were to reduce the salaries of the Government officers all round twenty per cent., I would say, consider it now, give it proper consideration, and then fairly decide on it. But if the pending bill be passed, have we any assurance that the Senate will meet us half way by concurring in our action and reducing the salaries of their employes? Suppose they should not do so, what would be the result? In one branch of the legislative department of the Government there would be one grade of salaries, and in the other a higher grade, although the officers of both discharge the same duties. I say, let us perfect this bill, send it to the Committee of the Whole, and let us provide in one bill a general system in reference to all the employes of the Government.

I have a few words to offer concerning the subject of extra compensation, which has been alluded to by several gentlemen who have preceded me. I have heard some dozen, and perhaps more, instances cited where this House has passed resolutions for extra compensation. They have been brought prominently before the House and held up to it as singular examples of legislation. They are not singular at all. I think I can go behind the examples presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and show, if it were necessary, that from the year 1800 down to this present time, it has been an almost uniform custom of this House to pass resolutions giving extra compensation, and that these resolutions have been uniformly responded to by the Treasury Department. Here is an example which occurred at the last Congress, and which is against the limitation pleaded in bar of the action of the House. You remember a resolution was offered at the first session of the last Congress to pay certain gentlemen who are now before me, gentlemen connected with the official paper of Congress, $300 each as extra compensation for their service as reporters of our debates. It was passed, and as much as has been said of objections, I do not recollect that a single member of this body objected to it. Not one. Even the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] did not object to it. The resolution was passed, and the money appropriated under it was paid at the Treasury Department. Now what difference exists between the case of the reporters for the Globe and those held up to the House by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it is a little hard that the gentleman from Ohio should hold up one case to which I did not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. NICHOLS. There were five hundred cases, I have no doubt, to which the gentleman did not object, and they could be shown if anybody would take the trouble to hunt them up. I have only alluded to this one case for effect upon the other side of the House, and with no invidious purpose whatever. I have voted for some of these extra-compensation resolutions, and against others, but from a full deliberation of the subject, I believe that the principle is wrong. Hereafter I think that I shall vote against them all. I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] whether the Secretary of the Treasury had not recommended the payment of the appropriations in the way of extra compensation to which he alluded? His answer was a general negative. I do not know to what extent that negative answer goes. A provision of the act of 1841 and the joint resolution of 1854, are relied upon at the Treasury Department to defeat all these appropriations. I do not see any distinction between these extras which are referred to and the separate and independent extras. I will read the conclusion of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with that shall conclude what I have to say:

"I have no doubt that these officers have so acted, and in refusing to settle their accounts no imputation is intended to be thrown upon their official conduct.

"In paying these accounts, they have only done what they were required to do, and what long established usage justified them in doing. Under such circumstances they should be protected from any loss or injury, and I have no doubt Congress will do it. The accounts must be suspended, however, until the meeting of Congress, when I will recommend the passage of a law authorizing the Department to pass them.

"In this way these officers can be amply protected, a wise and good law vindicated, and a bad practice corrected."

Mr. HASKIN. I desire to move an amendment as an additional section.

The SPEAKER. Amendment is not in order pending the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask that my amendment may be read for information.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the act providing for the compensation of Representatives in Congress, passed during the year 1853, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and that Representatives in Congress, after the passage of this act, in lieu of the salary now received, be paid a per diem allowance of eight dollars a day."

Mr. HASKIN. My motive in offering that amendment—

The SPEAKER. The amendment has not been entertained by the Chair.

Mr. HASKIN. Well, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that at the proper time I shall offer that, and insist upon its being adopted as an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Perhaps the gentleman who made the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will withdraw that motion to allow this amendment to be got in. I hope it will be got in. The motion to refer can then be renewed.

Mr. HASKIN. If that course is pursued, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. RUFFIN. I am willing to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] but I do not want it tacked on to this bill. The bill would be killed in that way. The proposition to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is an indirect way of killing it. Every member who has served in Congress heretofore knows that the success of that motion would kill the bill as effectually as if you were to vote it down here. I want members to come up here boldly, and vote upon this question. I, for one, as a member of the Committee of Accounts, do not intend to go into the committee room and act in the dark—vote to pay accounts which I know nothing about, and probably reject just ones whilst I allow unjust ones. We want this question settled one way or the other, and the Committee of Accounts have a right to ask this much of the House.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I want the committee to have a fair hearing. I am quite ready to meet the question fairly.

Mr. HASKIN. The statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the effect of my additional section will be to kill the bill, proves that the bill cannot stand upon its own merits.

Sir, a great deal has been said here upon the subject of retrenchment and reform. It is a hobby which men mount in every legislative body in this country, and they ride it to death. I am sincerely in favor of retrenchment and reform; but the retrenchment and reform sought to be enforced by the bill now before us, by cutting down the pay of the poor assistant doorkeepers and laborers about this building—men who have come here from States remote from the capital, and who have to pay heavy board here in addition to supporting their families at home, and of these little boys, who are supporting their mothers and brothers, is a species of picayune reform which I am not in favor of. Sir, when the responsible majority in this House will initiate a system of retrenchment and reform, striking at the enormous printing system which has led to the payment of millions by this Government, and striking at the excessive publication of books and documents which are printed and thrown away, and by which the printer alone is benefited, I will go for it. Why, sir, there is a proposition, I understand, before the House that the custom-house officers throughout the country—the paid agents of the Government, who are now creating public opinion in the North in favor of a monstrous and stupendous swindle—shall have their salaries increased to four dollars a day. I am against this kind of "reform," sir. I hope that if this bill is to be adopted, it may be so amended as to cut down our own salaries at the same time that it cuts down the pay of those who are as much entitled to it, if not more, than we are to ours.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I must be allowed to say, and I say it with all respect, that I am surprised beyond measure that gentlemen who avow themselves in favor of retrenchment and reform should resort to a contrivance or a policy obviously designed in its effects to defeat all reform. Sir, the bill under consideration has been matured with great caution and care, as every man will admit who knows the materials of which the committee which has prepared it is composed. They have considered the subject confided to them, and now, when it is up for consideration, gentlemen seek to defeat action upon it, first by referring it to a Committee of the Whole, and then by introducing other subjects of reform, that it may be equally important to consider as the one now before us. And, sir, the gentlemen who take this ground, the effect of which must be to defeat the bill, are the loudest thunderers on the subject of reform. I want the country to understand that there is a deliberate effort to strangle this bill under the pretense of including within it action upon other branches of public expense.

Sir, let me say to this House and the country, that the influence of those around us is felt in the action of members upon this floor. The very few who are to be affected by this bill, run around this Hall, and, by "soft impeachments," appeal to members to save them from the effects of that reform which is indispensable. The effect is recognized and felt, and many a good-hearted man has yielded to influences of this kind, without properly looking to the duty he owes to the country. If you multiply and enlarge the operation of this bill by including the general reforms in the executive Government, to which reference has been had; if you multiply the outside influences that operate more or less upon every member, what chance have you of achieving any reform at all? Sir, you can only accomplish reform by striking in detail. The aggregation of reforms is death to it.

Mr. Speaker, having said thus much upon that subject, allow me to call the attention of the House to the two points involved in this bill, as I understand it. The first object of the bill is to limit the number of officials requisite to attend to the duties in connection with this House, to define by law the number of subordinates who shall be called into our service by those whom we appoint to office. Is there a gentleman upon this floor who can object to that? I ask, is there a single gentleman upon this floor who will hesitate to agree to a proposition to define the number of employes that our head employes shall call into the service of the House? Is there a member here who would say that the Clerk of this House should not be restricted in the number of assistant clerks he shall employ, or that the Doorkeeper of this House should not be restricted in the number of messengers he shall employ? Not one, I presume. That, is one of the features of this bill, to limit the number and thereby to simplify the accounts and to restrain that discretion which has been greatly abused heretofore, as we suppose.

Then, sir, the next question is: of those to be retained and recognized by this bill, are the salaries fixed in it reasonable and proper? I was very much amused at my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN,] and at the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] and a little at the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SMITH,] when they talked so feelingly about the boys. Let me say to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Accounts that it is a great pity he did not introduce in his bill some change in regard to the pages, so as to give these gentlemen an opportunity of seizing upon it—

"To point a moral and adorn a tale."

But, sir, the only effect the bill has upon the pages is to increase their number, and to consecrate to them a legal, definite rate of compensation, the same as they have heretofore received. The chairman of the committee looked with pitying eye on these little infant petitioners, and increased their number, that more of them might have an opportunity of carrying out the ideas of gentlemen, in helping to support their widowed mothers and orphan brothers and sisters. And yet, in view of that, gentlemen get up a cry here about these little boys.

But let me call the attention of the House, really, in a candid and dispassionate spirit, to this bill; and I do it with the more confidence because I am sincerely desirous of seeing a sound and healthy reform effected. One side of the House can certainly have no objection to the reform. The other side of the House (I allude to the Democratic portion of it) are bound by every obligation—they owe it to duty and to their professions—to go on and do this work.

Look at this bill. Its first section reads as follows; and I want gentlemen to listen to it, in order that they may see—as I propose to treat this subject seriatim—the propriety of adopting the particular sections as I read them:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the officers of the House of Representatives hereinafter mentioned shall be, and are hereby, entitled to receive, in lieu of their compensation, the following sums, that is to say: the Clerk of the House of Representatives, $3,600; the chief clerk, $2,160; the Journal clerk, $2,160; five clerks, each $1,800; three clerks, each $1,400; and four clerks, each $1,200 per annum."

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman state the compensation of these clerks at the present time?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will come to that. Here, Mr. Speaker, is an enumeration of such a number of clerks that it would be difficult, for one uninformed in regard to it, to suppose they could possibly be necessary. Yet the honorable chairman of the committee having the subject in charge has carefully considered the matter; and on that examination, regularly instituted and carried out, has come to the conclusion that this number is necessary. I bow to his judgment and let it pass, because he has done what I have not—looked into the subject and carefully analyzed it. Then the question may be asked—and it is what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] refers to—what are the present salaries? And (I will add) why these peculiar amounts?

The present salaries are the same as here specified. I believe it was under the resolution of 1854, to increase the salaries then allowed, that these figures were reached. For instance, the Clerk of the House was entitled to $3,000 a year. The twenty per cent. additional made his salary six hundred dollars more. This bill provides for giving to the Clerk, as a working man, what is now allowed him by the existing law—$3,600 a year. So likewise with the chief clerk. So likewise with the Journal Clerk. So likewise with all the other clerks. But the gentleman from New York, who reports a substitute, [Mr. SEARING,] is not satisfied with giving to this batch of clerks what they have heretofore received according to law, but is in favor of giving to one of them—the Journal clerk, I believe—$2,500 a year.

Mr. HILL. Does not the original bill increase the salaries?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No increase at all, as I understand it. It allows the present number of clerks and the present compensation. These clerks are, as we know, gentlemen occupying highly responsible and important positions. The Clerk of the House has a laborious duty to perform, and a highly responsible one; and I have faith in him that he will perform that duty. There is required of him not only skill, diligence, intelligence, but a high degree of integrity. The position of the reading clerk is also a highly responsible one. So likewise with the others. I ask the House whether it is prepared to go for the amendment, which increases the compensation of any of the clerks enumerated in the first section? I ask them if they will not vote for the bill as reported, in preference to any substitute proposing to swell the compensation of any one, or all of them?

The only difference between the substitute proposed and the bill reported by the committee is, as I understand it, in regard to a single clerk, whose salary the substitute proposes to raise from $2,160 to $2,500.

The second section reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ three messengers at a compensation of $3 per day each during the year, and not exceeding eight messengers at a compensation of $3 per day each during the session of Congress; and two laborers at a compensation of $1 50 each during the year, and not exceeding six laborers at a compensation of $1 50 each during the time employed."

Sir, I pause here; and I ask the House with confidence whether the compensation here provided is not liberal? I ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SMITH,] where they sell corn at ten cents a bushel, and where the salary of $1,000 is deemed enough for the chief magistrate of the State—

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I wish to say that when Illinois adopted her constitution she was not able to pay the interest on her debt, and there was patriotism enough in her citizens to work for simply enough to pay their expenses, and even for less. The salaries of the governor and judges were fixed; not because we did not believe that their services were worth more, but we thought it more honorable to pay our debts, and to work for nothing at all, if necessary, so as to be able to do that. I trust that is a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I know the gentleman has a glorious people; but I reckon they are not disposed to work for love and glory alone, any more than are other people. Their chief magistrate, as I understand, gets $1,000 a year; and their chief justice, who has to expound the laws of the country, $1,200. And is it to be supposed that a messenger of this House—respectable to be sure, but from whom no high degree of intelligence or learning is to be expected—cannot put up with a salary equal to what the governor or chief justice of Illinois receives?

Again, here are laborers provided for at $1 50 a day. How many men are there in the country who would be glad, especially at the present time, to get fifty cents a day? But these men get $1 50 because we are told that Washington is an expensive place to live in. I ask this House, and ask it with confidence, to look back to the sources of their power, and to inquire how many there are among their constituents who would not take a hop, skip, and jump, at these places, at the compensation provided for in the bill?

The third section reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one clerk at a salary of $1,800, and one clerk at a salary of $1,400 per annum, to continue the alphabetical index of private claims: Provided, That such clerks shall be employed only for such time as may be actually required to complete the work to the close of the present Congress."

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to answer me the same question with reference to the second section, whether it authorizes an increase or diminution of pay?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. This is not a reduction in the number of employés, as I understand it, but a reduction in the rate of pay.

Mr. HILL. I now repeat the same question in reference to the third section.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I presume this is no reduction of compensation; but of this I am not advised. The chairman of the committee can inform the gentleman better than I can.

Mr. MASON. I understand, from a gentleman who has had long experience in performing that business, that he is willing to take this work at $1,800, and that another gentleman is willing to take the other place at $1,400. There is no difficulty at all in getting competent men to fill the offices at the prices we have named.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that these are as competent men as the ones now in office?

Mr. MASON. One is a man who has been carrying on this business, and is willing to go on until the end of the present Congress, at $1,800.

Mr. HILL. Is he the present incumbent?

Mr. MASON. No, sir; but he is here in town, and ready to take the position.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The fourth section is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall hereafter be $2,160 per annum."

That is the present salary, being twenty per cent. advance on the original salary; and it very properly has not been reduced. The fifth section reads:

"And be it further enacted, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a superintendent of the folding-room at a compensation of $1,800 per annum; and that he may employ, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts of the House of Representatives, such number of folders and laborers as may be deemed necessary to perform the work; and also, that he may employ, under the direction of the said committee, two horses during the session of Congress; and that he may receive a suitable allowance for expenses in sending messages and dispatches by messengers and pages."

For the reasons stated by the gentleman over the way, [Mr. NICHOLS,] a large number of employés were in the folding-room during the last Congress; and it is one of the unhappy consequences of employment here, that when a man once gets his finger into the public service, he never takes it out. He appeals to the good nature and forbearance of his employers, and manages to work along. I suppose the gentleman from Kentucky, who is the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, has found it necessary to regulate this matter by a law. A great abuse always has existed, and always will exist, unless the supervising eye of some committee is to control it.

Mr. HILL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. If I understand him right, he says that when a man once gets his hand into the Treasury he never takes it out. Now, I should like to know whether there is not a new set of clerks in some of these offices, and what has become of the old ones?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The old ones were compelled to go with tears in their eyes, and the new ones think it very hard indeed, as they have not had a taste for a long time, that Democrats should cut them down. But, sir, I care not for that. As a Representative of the people, I seek to advance the cause of the particular party with which I am happy to cooperate. I should be very happy in dividing up fat places, cateris paribus, to give a friend the preference; but I will not violate the principles of that party to pander to the interests of a friend.

Section six of this bill reads:

"And be it further enacted, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ not exceeding fourteen messengers, at a compensation of three dollars per day each per annum; and not exceeding eleven messengers at a compensation of three dollars each per day during the session of Congress; and not exceeding four laborers at a compensation of $1 50 each per day during the year; and not exceeding five laborers at a compensation of $1 50 per day each during the session of Congress; and not exceeding twenty pages, between the ages of ten and sixteen years, at a compensation of $2 per day each during the session of Congress."

He is to have fourteen messengers at three dollars per day—Sundays included. There are no intervals as in private employment. The employés are paid, and paid without interruption, when in the employment of Uncle Sam. Three dollars per day—more than one thousand dollars a year—and nothing to do a good part of the time. Now, sir, I have been reading this bill seriatim, section by section, so that, if the people of the country do me the honor to read my remarks, they will understand the subject and see how the public Treasury is run away with and squandered. Under the former system the service was performed quite as well as now, and this bill proposes a compensation of three dollars per day, which is an increase on the former compensation. I now read the seventh section:

"And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the Postmaster of the House of Representatives shall hereafter be $2,160 per annum."

Mr. HILL. I desire to say that I have no feeling whatever upon this subject—not the least in the world. I am seeking merely for information. I do not even know how I shall vote on the bill. I desire to know of my friend from Virginia whether he has made an estimate as to the results of this measure; how much it would save to the public Treasury?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know. A member of the Committee of Accounts, when the same question was propounded to him, stated that he presumed it would save fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars. That is the opinion which has been expressed on this floor. I know nothing about it.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. SEWARD. I object to this farming out the floor in this way.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am entitled to the floor, and I yield it to the gentleman from Kentucky for explanation.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] and to other members of the House, that we did not go into this matter for the purpose of retrenchment and reform only. We found everything in an unsettled condition; we found everything in confusion, and we thought it due to the House to settle for itself what number of officers should be in its employ, and at what compensation. We thought that as committees had been appointed to investigate the frauds of the last House of Representatives, this body had better set its own House in order before it found fault with others. We have done what we have done with reference to having competent officers, and with reference to having the duties discharged, and not with a view of punishing one or rewarding another.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have thus submitted my views upon this subject. I can assure the House that I have hesitated in the performance of this duty. I have been pressed by gentlemen around me to forbear. I have been appealed to to let the present system alone; and I was at one time almost disposed to yield to that appeal. But, sir, it has been my habit, when my affections are appealed to against a sense of duty, to resist that appeal. I believe that the compensation allowed here is liberal; I believe it is ample. I might indulge in a train of remark to show that this course is safer. At any rate I will strike where I can, to prevent every hungry and needy eye from turning towards this Government as the Mahommedan does towards Mecca for support. I will not encourage men to come up here in crowds and cluster round this Hall at the organization of every Congress. I will not recognize by my action or influence that great element of consolidation which is involved in the compensation of our officials of every kind.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. The gentleman says he will not encourage parties to come up here from every section of the country for offices. Will he tell me how many from his district alone are now in official positions under the Government?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that is not a pertinent question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Allow me to say that it does not become the member from New York—

The SPEAKER. It is not competent for the gentleman to discuss that matter.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Mr. Speaker, I feel that, if I were called to decide on this question now, I must necessarily vote in the dark. We have a bill here which proposes to fix the number of the employés of the House, and also to fix their compensation. I infer, from the debate which has taken place, that the object of the bill is to reduce the expenditures of the Government. I am disposed to do what I can to reduce the unnecessary expenses of the Government, and, if the debate which has ensued is a correct indication, I sympathize with this bill. But, sir, I have not the information I desire; and I am inclined to the opinion that the members of this House generally do not know how many clerks, doorkeepers, and other employés of the House there are now existing under the law, and what is their compensation. Therefore, I am in favor of giving that direction to this bill which will enable the Committee of Accounts to do what I conceive to have been their duty in the first place; and I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts, with instructions to report to the House how many clerks, doorkeepers, and other employes now exist under the law, and what is the compensation allowed to each. I think it would be better for the Committee of Accounts to make a report, to place before this House, with the bill, information as to the number of employes at present, and their compensation, so that we may determine whether we are economizing or not in voting for this measure.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a suggestion in reference to his motion to recommit. I have sought the floor on two points. I have taken some trouble to investigate the amount that this bill would save to the Government, and I find that the difference between the pay under the old law and that proposed by the Committee of Accounts, as well as I can ascertain it, to be nearly twenty thousand dollars. Perhaps, however, the sum is not so large. Another suggestion to which I will call the attention of the gentleman is this: the Committee of Accounts, as I understand, propose to do away with the land-map clerks employed under the House.

Mr. RUFFIN. The Committee of Accounts have nothing to do with these clerks.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. It is said that these clerks have nothing to do. I understand that a requisition has been made upon these clerks today to do work which will take them six months. It is in reference to the unsold lands in the State of Illinois. I refer to these things, that my colleague may see the propriety of referring this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that this bill has nothing to do with these land-map clerks at all.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. The question in my mind when my colleague rose to give me this information, was whether I could safely rely upon his conclusion. I feel that I want to examine myself the data upon which he comes to this conclusion. It seems that in his first premise he has fallen into an error. I am unable to tell, unless I have the information before me, whether his conclusion is correct or not. I deem that it is eminently proper in a bill like this that the Committee of Accounts should make a report, placing the facts upon our tables that every gentleman may examine for himself, and see whether there is a reduction, and if so, what is its extent, and also, whether the reduction is made at the proper point. These are matters of detail which ought to have examination. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts, with instructions that they report the number of present clerks and other employes of the House, and the compensation which is now paid to each of them under the law.

Mr. STANTON. There is a class of economists who will never support any measure except it is perfect in every respect. They do not support any, for the reason that it does not begin at the right place, or affect the proper officers, or some other reason. Although they are very decided economists in all kinds of expenditure, yet there is some special reason why this bill does not meet their approbation. I always have a great sympathy for this class of economists, because they are so difficult to please. Now, sir, if I find a proposition which is in itself a legitimate and proper measure of economy, I shall not stop to see whether there may not be something else done in addition. I will take what is presented, and whatever else I can lay my hand on, as a separate and distinct proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the bill now before the House to be in substance a bill to reduce anybody's salary. I do not understand it to be a proposition to reduce anybody's compensation. That is not the question. I understand that there is no definite and distinct legislation, no explicit law limiting the number of the employes of this House. That I understand to be the difficulty. The Committee of Accounts, as we learn from its members, are pressed for the payment of claims by persons who say that they are employes of this House. The committee have no means of ascertaining who are legally, properly, and legitimately employed. They have no means of ascertaining the precise rate of compensation to which the various officers of the House are entitled. They present this bill here that there may be a law which will definitely and distinctly fix the number of the employes, and the compensation to which each shall be entitled.

I confess my utter inability to comprehend any reason upon which an objection to such a bill can be founded. No gentleman says that the employes are not sufficiently numerous. No gentleman says that there ought to be more clerks or more messengers. They do not say there are too few. They do not say that the compensation is not sufficient. Then, I ask, what objection can there be to the bill? There seems to be a general suspicion that some of these officers will be cut off. Nobody knows who will be reached, and some of the members are afraid that it will cut off some of their appointments and protégés, and remove them from feeding at the public crib. There is one thing certain—I have no friends at the public crib, and I am not troubled by any considerations like those I have mentioned; and I think that my friends on this side of the House have no need to be troubled on that score. If it is a legitimate and proper measure of economy, they certainly can have no personal objection to voting for it. Permit me to make another remark. I, for one, regard the course of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] the Representative of an adjoining district, as an evidence that he is operated upon by patriotic motives, and not by personal considerations. As regards the number of employes there may be here from his district, the greater the number the stronger is the evidence of his patriotism in the course he pursues in advocating this bill. Gentlemen around me say the bill will not reach them. That is a question for those who have charge of these appointments to settle. If there is too large a proportion of the gentleman's constituents employed, they can be removed any day; and because of that too great proportion he is in greater danger than any other gentleman upon this floor of having his constituents suffer from the operation of this bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, the evil that this bill seeks to remedy must be apparent to every gentleman who has served in former Congresses. Every one knows that, just at the close of the session, persons who have been employed by the officers of this House in various subordinate capacities, as clerks, or messengers, or pages, without authority of law, come here and appeal to the equity of the House, or to the good nature of members, for compensation for the services they have rendered. That is where the difficulty arises. There come up here, on the 3d of March, at a short session, or on the last day of a long session, resolutions reciting that A, B, and C have been employed in this, that, and the other capacity, and have rendered very valuable services to the House; and that, therefore, they be paid the same rate of compensation that is paid to other employes performing similar services. Men engage in these various employments about the House with the expectation and the confident belief that at the expiration of the session their services will be compensated, although there is no law by authority of which they can be employed, and although they are serving without any actual employment.

Now, I take it that this bill is intended to cut off all that description of uncertainty about the employes of the House which exists under the present law. There is another thing that I should be exceedingly glad if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] would adopt as an amendment to this bill, which I am very much afraid would not be reached by the provisions of the present law; and that is, that this House shall not, by resolution, at the close of its sessions, authorize any increased compensation to any employe of the House, to be paid out of its contingent fund, or from any other source. Let us fix all the salaries at what is liberal, adequate, and sufficient, so that every man shall know how much he is to have, and not at the end of the session add twenty, twenty-five, or fifty per cent. to the compensation of our employes.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection at all to such a provision being incorporated into this bill; but I understand that that is the law now.

Mr. STANTON. It is suggested to me that this subject has been sufficiently discussed, and I demand the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FLORENCE and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, nays 40.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. GEORGE D. CUMMINS, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of Robert Hale, praying for compensation for his improvement in war rockets, and for his stand for firing them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of Francis D. Pons, for himself and Peter Pons, late partners in trade, praying that he may be allowed to prove his claims for losses in Florida, in 1812 and 1813, before the judge of the northern district of Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SLIDELL presented two memorials of citizens of New Orleans, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced on board our vessels of war for the improvement of the personnel of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition of the heirs-at-law of S. Girard and others, praying for the confirmation of their title to certain lands in the State of Louisiana; which was reported to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLARK presented the memorial of William A. Vaughan, John Smith, William D. Little, and others, praying for compensation for services as inspectors at the port of Portsmouth, New Hampshire; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. IVERSON presented the petition of J. W. Brown, praying Congress to purchase his patent for the manufacture of fire-arms, which will greatly lessen the cost of their manufacture; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented a petition of assistant engineers in the Navy, praying that their pay may date from their promotion, and not from the issue of their warrants by the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GWIN presented papers relating to the claim of S. W. Holladay and others; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Lewis F. Tasistro, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Charles A. Kinkead, in behalf of Livingston, Kinkead & Co., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAY OF DEPUTY SURVEYORS.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation now allowed by law to the United States deputy surveyors in the State of California, for surveying private land claims in that State.

LAND LAWS.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be prepared, under their supervision and control, a continuation of the compilation of the laws and decisions of the Departments of Treasury and Interior pertaining to the public lands, accompanied by the opinions of Attorneys General, and decisions of the Supreme Court relating to said laws, with a full and copious index, so as to bring the work heretofore published, under the authority of a resolution passed by the Senate on the 28th day of February, 1857, down to the present time.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DURKEE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Marvin, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 177) to confirm to William Marvin title to lands in East Florida. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Henderson, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Olivia Landry, of the State of Louisiana, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 180) to amend the several acts now in force in relation to the Patent Office; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Anson Dart, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 181) for the relief of Anson Dart. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of George Frasier, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George Frasier, and that the petition and papers be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BIGGS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Camille St. Amant, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed. He asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Miles Devine, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD, in pursuance of previous notice, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 174) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships or other vessels," approved March 3, 1853; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GWIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of S. W. Holladay and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOUSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 178) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. HOUSTON also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 179) to extend the provisions of section twelve of the "act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853," which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to remark that this bill would have been introduced before the present time had it not been that I was waiting for information called for from the Navy Department some time since, which has not yet been received, and hence I am induced to delay no longer. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

STURGES, BENNETT AND CO.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 121) for the relief of Sturges, Bennett & Co., merchants of the city of New York, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

SOUND DUES TREATY.

Mr. HUNTER. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill of the House of Representatives, No. 271, to report it back without amendment. I ask the general consent of the Senate to pass the bill now. There is a necessity for it, and I imagine there is no objection to it. It is simply to carry out a treaty.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (H. R. No. 271) to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

The bill appropriates, in order to carry out the stipulation contained in the third article of the treaty, $393,011; and to carry out the stipulation contained in the sixth article, $15,720 44, or so much of that sum as may be necessary to pay the interest provided for in it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BIGLER. I ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question being put, the Senator was excused.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I ask the permission of the Senate to be relieved from serving upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. My name was placed on the committee merely for the purpose of holding a position until some of the gentlemen who had not taken seats in the Senate at that time had arrived. That having taken place, I now ask to be relieved.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire to state, in reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia, that I accepted the place with the understanding that when the Senator from Texas [Mr. HENDERSON] should make his appearance I should retire from that committee. I move that the Vice President be authorized to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. HENDERSON was appointed.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I move that the Chair fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, caused by my being excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY HUBBARD.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 123) for the relief of Henry Hubbard. It is a small private bill which passed the Senate at the last session. It has received the unanimous sanction of the Committee on Claims, who recommend its passage. I hope the Senate will permit it to pass now. I think there can be no objection to it.

The bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides the payment to Henry Hubbard of the sum of $672 75, for his services as United States agent charged with the safe-keeping of the public property at the harbor of Ashtabula, Ohio, as certified by the bureau of topographical engineers, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the 11th of June, 1856, from which time payment is shown to have been delayed for want of an appropriation.

Mr. POLK. I will say to the Senate in reference to this claim, having had the duty of investigating it before the Committee on Claims, that there is no question about the services having been performed, and the rate of compensation. The account was regularly presented, and was approved at the proper Department, but it was not paid for the reason that there was no appropriation for its payment. The committee, therefore, unanimously were in favor of reporting a bill to the Senate for the payment of the claim, and also for allowing interest from the time at which it was made known to the claimant that there was no appropriation for his payment. Interest is only allowed from that day.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOM-HOUSES IN IOWA.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that the next business before the Senate was the following resolution, reported by Mr. BENJAMIN from the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to provide for the objects referred to in said resolution.

This resolution was reported by the Committee on Commerce who had been instructed by the following resolution, which was adopted by the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house at Keokuk, in the State of Iowa; also as to the propriety of making Sioux City, in said State, a port of delivery, and of making an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house at the latter place.

The resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS IN FLORIDA.

The next business before the Senate was the report made by Mr. BENJAMIN from the Committee on Commerce who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of inspectors of the hulls and boilers of steamers in Florida; and to whom were referred a petition of citizens of Franklin county, Florida, and the presentment of the grand jury of the United States district court of the northern district of Florida on the same subject. The committee reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the reasons expressed in the annexed communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is inexpedient to make the appointments suggested in the resolution.

The resolution of the Committee on Commerce was agreed to.

J. ROSS BROWNE'S REPORT.

The Senate next proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SEBASTIAN on the 26th of January:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate the report of J. Ross Browne, special agent of the Indian department, on the Indian affairs of Oregon and Washington Territories.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That resolution was, by order of the Senate, laid on the table because a similar one, offered by the Senator from Mississippi, now absent, [Mr. DAVIS], had been adopted a few days previous. The report has long since been communicated to the Senate. I move, therefore, the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS-LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The business in order was the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. DOUGLAS on the 4th of February:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish all the information within his possession or control on the following points:

1. The returns and votes for and against a convention at an election held in the Territory of Kansas, in October, 1856.
2. The census and registration of votes in the Territory of Kansas, under the provisions of the act of said Legislature, passed in February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates and assembling a convention to frame a constitution.
3. The returns of an election held in said Territory on the 21st of December, 1857, under the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, upon the question of "constitution with slavery" or "constitution without slavery."
4. The returns of an election held in the Territory of Kansas on the 4th day of January, 1858, under the authority of a law passed by the Legislature of said Territory, submitting the constitution formed by the Lecompton convention to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection.
5. The returns of the election held in said Territory on the 4th day of January, 1858, under the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, for Governor and other State officers, and for members of the Legislature, specifying the names of each officer to whom a certificate of election has been accorded, and the number of votes cast and counted for each candidate, and distinguishing between the votes returned within the time and in the mode provided in said schedule, and those returned subsequently and in other modes, and stating whether, at either of said elections, any returns of votes were rejected in consequence of not having been returned in time, or to the right officer, or in proper form, or for any other cause, stating specifically for what cause.

6. All correspondence between any of the Executive Departments and Secretary or Governor Denver relating to Kansas affairs, and which has not been communicated to the Senate.

Resolved, That in the event all the information desired in the foregoing resolution is not now in the possession of the President, or of any of the Executive Departments, he be respectfully requested to give the proper orders and take the necessary steps to procure the same for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust there will be no objection now to the adoption of these resolutions. I regret that they were not adopted when they were first brought in; because, if they had been, we should probably have received by this time all the information which they call for. I desired, at that time, to have those facts, in order that they might be used before the Committee on Territories, as well as in the Senate. The resolution calls for facts which I consider material. Some of these facts are alleged to be embodied in the report of the majority of the Committee on Territories; and I see the report states that Mr. Calhoun, before the committee, furnished statements in regard to a few of the facts here called for. I see, by a communication in the newspapers, addressed by Mr. Calhoun to the people of the United States, that he says he has communicated to the Committee on Territories fully the facts in regard to the history and origin of the Lecompton convention. I can only say that, as a member and as chairman of the Committee on Territories, I was present at every one of the meetings of the committee; but I never saw Mr. Calhoun there; I never heard that he was there; I never heard of a proposition to invite him there; I never saw a communication from him addressed to the committee; I never had one from him, directly or indirectly, touching affairs of Kansas as a communication to the committee. It is true, that, having seen these statements in the newspapers on that Thursday morning when the report was made, when I had not time to read the report, I inquired of a member of the committee whether any communication had been received from Mr. Calhoun; and I was told that one had been shown to a member of the committee, and taken back by Mr. Calhoun to be corrected and copied; but still it has never come to the committee. The committee, as a committee, have not been permitted to see the facts which are put forth to the world as having been furnished by the president of the convention to the committee. Now, I want to know whether or not communications are to be made by President John Calhoun to a majority of the committee, and withheld from the minority, who are deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining him, or testing his knowledge of the facts, he not putting them in such a form as to make himself responsible for the truth of the statements thus made?

Sir, Mr. Calhoun is in this city. He is a Government office-holder; he is the surveyor general of Kansas Territory, and is held for his good conduct by his commission. He is absent from his duties in Kansas, and is here, as it is supposed, to favor the project of the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. Why is it that the President tolerates him in being here, and in withholding the facts which are essential to an enlightened judgment on this question? Mr. Calhoun does not hesitate, and has not hesitated, to say, and authorize newspapers in St. Louis and other places to publish the fact, that the pro-slavery, or Democratic ticket, as he calls it, was elected for the Legislature and State officers in Kansas on the 4th of January. He does not hesitate to say to other individuals here, that his present opinion is that the free-State ticket has been elected; but he does not hesitate to say, also, that he never intends to issue certificates to anybody until Congress admits Kansas into the Union with the Lecompton constitution; and if we refuse to admit it, then he never will declare the result.

I wish to know whether there is not some way of ascertaining the facts of the case? Are we to be required to act blindly here, one part of the country being given to understand that they have got it all their own way—the other part of the country understanding that the certificates are to go the other way? Each one here is called upon to give a vote on his expectations or private assurances that it is this way or that way, and then to wait and find who is to be cheated after the act is consummated. Sir, I no not think it becomes the Senate of the United States thus to be trifled with by one of the Government office-holders. The only law under which Mr. Calhoun professes to act—the schedule to the Lecompton constitution—provided that the returns shall be made to him within eight days. He gave notice on the ninth day to the Speakers of the two Houses of the Kansas Legislature that he would count the votes. The votes were counted; and then he refused to declare the result; and we are to understand one day that the result is one way, and another day that it is the other way. It will not do to say it is immaterial which way the result is. It is material; and why?

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. Was there any day limited, or appointed by law, on which the results of these elections should be ascertained?

Mr. DOUGLAS. By implication, I think, it is fairly to be deduced. The schedule provided that the vote on the constitution should be taken on the 21st of December, and returned within eight days thereafter, and it should then be sent to Congress. It provided that, for State officers, the election should be held and regulated in the same manner as the vote on the constitution, thus carrying the clear implication that the returns should be made, and the result counted, at the end of eight days from the day of election. There is no escape, then, from the conclusion that it was his duty to make the count at the end of eight days. He acknowledged that this was his duty, by giving notice to the Speakers of the two Houses to be present and witness the counting of the votes on the ninth day. They opened the votes, and added them up; but still we are not permitted to know whether that adding up is to stand. We hear one day that the assurance is given that the pro-slavery ticket is to be declared elected; we hear the next day that the assurance is given that the free-State ticket is to be declared elected.

Let me state the importance of this point. The President tells us that this constitution may be amended by the first Legislature. Now, if the Lecompton ticket is elected to the Legislature, and a majority of that Legislature is opposed to any change, it is important to know the fact; because it shows that the expectation held out, that the constitution may be changed, is a delusion and a deception. To hold out the idea that the first Legislature may provide for a change, and then pack a Legislature hostile to a change, is only practicing a deception. Let us know whether there is a Legislature elected that is in favor of a change, and then we can listen to the argument whether that Legislature, under the constitution, can provide for a change of the constitution.

It is important, also, to know what State ticket is elected, for this reason: suppose the free-State or anti-Lecompton ticket is elected to the Legislature, and there is a majority of that party, yet there is not two thirds; and then the question is whether the Lecompton candidate for Governor is elected, in order to veto any bill that the majority of the Legislature might pass, providing for an amendment of the constitution. These facts become important, unless we are to be called upon to vote in the dark; unless a trick is to be played upon us; unless one party or the other is to be cheated.

It is important to have this result known; and why is it that gentlemen here are not willing to have the facts settled? Why do southern men desire to be called upon to vote in doubt? Why do northern men desire to be called upon to vote in doubt? ["It is none of our business."] I am told it is none of our business. I will tell the Senator who said so why I think it is both his business and mine. We are called upon here to put this constitution in force, and recognize the State government that may be organized in Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and give it operation; but every day evidence comes here of fraud after fraud, and forgery after forgery, in the returns. It is not confined now to the Delaware Crossing, which is admitted to have been a forged return; but the testimony has been taken, and is conclusive, that there was a forged return also, to the amount of some nine hundred votes, at Shawnee; that the returns were taken from Shawnee down into Missouri, and there for two days. Two men were adding names, one man calling off the names from the poll-book that had been made out at the election of the 21st of December, and the other adding those names by the hundred to the poll-book of the election of the 4th of January. On the day after the election, the testimony is, that in the State of Missouri some nine hundred names were added. There were only about one hundred and sixty votes on the book before this addition, when the poll-book left the Territory; but, after it got into Missouri, it swelled up to eleven hundred votes. These facts are proved; they were testified to by the men who were present, and by the men who transcribed the names.

So it is with regard to Oxford; so it is with regard to Kickapoo. The testimony as to Kickapoo is, that, although there had been vast numbers of illegal votes during the day, young Thomas Ewing, son of the late Secretary of the Interior, voted next to the last; only one man voted after him, according to the testimony; yet the poll-book shows some five hundred names added subsequent to his. The certificate was cut off; five hundred names were added; and then the certificate was pasted on after these names. The testimony is equally conclusive as to Shawnee, where seven hundred or nine hundred votes were added. A man by the name of Bailey was the last man who voted, according to the testimony. The proof is conclusive that he was the last man who voted; and then they cut off the certificate, put on seven hundred or nine hundred names, and pasted it on again; and they call that a return!

These facts are well known to the world; they are proven before the officers of the law; they are known to Mr. Calhoun, the president of this convention. He is here in this city under the protection of the President of the United States, and held by his commission. He withholds the facts and the Senate refuses to permit the information to be extracted, and we are told that it is none of our business. We are called upon—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator pause for a moment? It is the duty of the Chair to call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I never knew a debate to be cut off in its midst; but if that is the rule, I must yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is positive. The Chair has cut off debate fifteen or twenty times since the commencement of the session.

Mr. GREEN. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule, for I intend to reply to this fully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the special order. My duty is imperative, and has been exercised repeatedly during the session. If there is no motion to postpone the special order, it will now be taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday, I was speaking of the first attempted organization of the territorial government of Kansas under the organic act. I endeavored to show that it was made by force of an invasion from Missouri, spreading itself all over the Territory, and overawing and over-voting, in an unlawful manner, the people who inhabited the Territory.

There have been attempted some excuses for this act. They have been mainly found in what has been alleged to be the conduct of the Emigrant Aid Society in sending out to Kansas persons from Massachusetts, though nothing is said at the same time about the Blue Lodge associations which had been formed in the vicinity for the purpose of taking possession of the Territory at the first bound. But, sir, I do not wish to be led off, as I think the community has been attempted to be led off, from examining into the true character of that invasion, by directing their attention and exciting their prejudices against some other people. I can merely say that the act of the Emigrant Aid Society, in aiding persons who wished to go to Kansas for the purpose of settling, and, if you please, making it a free State also, had nothing unlawful in it; it was laudable and desirable. There was no single feature of illegality in it, and the purpose which they entertained, though it may call for anathemas and vituperation, really, after all, is not censurable.

But, sir, there has been an infinite deal of unnecessary labor expended about that point, for if you examine truly into what the aid society did, you find that it amounted to very little. In the month of February, 1855, before this invasion from Missouri, and the first election, which was in March, 1855, a census was taken of the people of the Territory; the name of each person was put down, and the State from which he came. That census has been returned by the Governor and is in the archives of the State Department here. It was made for the purpose of partitioning out the Territory, and apportioning the representatives to the Legislature amongst the different districts, which was done. On a careful examination of that census, and of the places from which the people came, I have made a little table which is before me. No persons were ever aided by that Emigrant Aid Society except from New England, and, I say, but a very small portion of those. In the month of February, 1855, there were in that Territory only one hundred and eighty-three men from all the New England States. I say not one-half of them had any connection with the society in any way, or knew anything about it; but it is the fact that only one hundred and eighty-three men in all were in that Territory from New England; and this is undertaken to be made the foundation of an excuse for the military invasion from Missouri of between four and five thousand men going in armed, with banners flying, drums beating, and marching with all the array of war. If it were true that those people had gone there, even, if you please, with the horrid notion of abolitionizing Kansas—an awful idea!—can it be made the foundation for any sort of justification for this invasion, conquest, and subjugation of that country?

Did that act of invasion, that mode of attempting to organize the government, leave the people of Kansas "free?" Certainly not. Has the Senate of the United States—has the Government of the United States done anything on earth to redeem the pledge of "perfect freedom?" Have they endeavored to redress these people? Have they endeavored to correct that wrong? As I said before, we are told that if there was any objection to those persons who were elected members of the Legislature, the people could go to that Legislature and have it corrected. What a mockery is this! You may go to the usurpers in order to pass on the legality and correctness of their own usurpations! I fancy that gentlemen here, and especially those who are lawyers, understand the distinction between a challenge to the array of a jury, and a challenge for favor of particular members. When the challenge is to the array, how idle it would be to undertake to call upon those very jurors thus collected, to pass on the question whether they were legally brought together. I know that in challenges to favor, the good old practice of the common law was this: if an individual is challenged, triers are appointed, and they pass upon his case; and when they have passed upon three of them, they become so many members of the jury; the triers are dismissed; the jury go on passing upon the challenges to individuals, until you fill up the jury box; but you see they are expurgated, and persons are called that are not obnoxious to the objection. But how could that Legislature thus usurped, thus put into power by an invasion from abroad, aiding and assisting a very small minority of that people, pass upon the challenge of the array? And yet we are told that we are estopped from going into that matter, because the Legislature passed upon it! No, sir, there was no mode of correcting this wrong but by an act of legislation, and that has been denied.

Now, sir, in order to trace how it is that the constitution which we have now before us is the child, the result, the ultimate fruit and consequence of that usurpation, it is necessary to see how it was that those who were thus inducted into power perpetuated that power, how their action operated to produce this constitution in its present form. That can be done briefly. When that Legislature assembled they proceeded to pass laws, as they called them. Among those laws was one which required that every person who might be permitted to vote at all, should, if challenged, take an oath to support the fugitive slave law. In the next place they passed an act which declared men subject to penalties and imprisonment if they should publish or declare anything which questioned the right of a man to hold slaves in the Territory of Kansas. That is a topic that they were not permitted to discuss at all; that was put under the ban. Then provision was made that men might vote on paying taxes, but no time of residence was required—of course intending that all those who lived near there could come in, settle for a day, pay a tax of fifty cents or a dollar, and vote, so that they might be saved the trouble of military expeditions afterwards. The purpose, the object, of those laws is perfectly obvious. No man in the exercise of ordinary discernment can possibly avoid seeing what it was. It was to drive the free-State people out of that Territory; it was to disfranchise them.

Is it possible that any State or Territory, when Congress have passed a law and fixed the penalties for breaches of that law, can go on and absolutely disfranchise men if they will not swear to support it? Did the Congress of the United States, in passing the fugitive slave law, ever declare or intimate that they supposed people could be disfranchised as citizens unless they would swear to support it? Has any State or Territory a right to add new sanctions, new penalties and new consequences to the breach of a congressional act? Again, it is said now that the slavery question is the question which, above all others, was intended to be left to the people there, and to regulate which they were to be left "perfectly free;" and the Missouri compromise, we are told, was repealed in order that they might be left to act freely upon it. Can it be possible that they were to be gagged on that subject, and were to be absolutely prohibited from discussing it altogether? Yet that was the legislation. It is perfectly certain that they not only intended this to be the effect, but they carried it out accordingly; for when they undertook to put these laws in operation we know what was the result. Printing presses were destroyed and declared nuisances. Bills were found against them as a nuisance, and the nuisance was abated without a verdict! A bridge, across which free-State people could pass, was a nuisance, and that was abated! The types and presses were thrown into the river. The city of Lawrence was to be abated; and if any man made any sort of a defense it was constructive treason! The people were imprisoned; they were hunted out; and if the officers whom the minority appointed at any time and place wanted assistance they called in a posse—who? Persons from Missouri. They overrun the country; the people were hunted out. I will not attempt to describe the ravages, the violence and blood which followed this in all its tracks. That was the season of 1856.

One thing, however, must be perfectly certain—that the free-State people then there, and who should go there while these test oaths and this gag law continued in force, were disfranchised people; they could take no participation in an election. The circumstances under which they were permitted to vote were such as utterly forbade their exercising the right of suffrage. How long did these laws continue in force? Until the 20th of February, 1857. That date becomes important.

What took place while these laws were in operation, and while these people stood thus disfranchised? An act was passed by the Territorial Legislature by which the people were asked to vote whether they would have a convention to form a State constitution. That question was put to the people. The free-State men could not legally participate in that election, and did not participate in it; and yet they are found fault with because they did not, and it is said they are estopped because they did not. What next? The second election of a Legislature took place in October, 1856. The same laws were then in force, and the Legislature which met in January and February, 1857, was elected by the same minority. The whole body of the free-State people of that Territory were utterly excluded from that election, in the manner I have stated. They had nothing to do with it; they could have nothing to do with it—not merely that they did not desire to have anything to do with it, but the very forms of the law were made to deprive them from having anything to do with it, and did deprive them. It ill becomes men who are now trying to take advantage of that, to say to them, "you could have voted." "Did you mean we should?" Evidently you did not. Certainly nothing was put to these people but this: you shall have slaves or you shall be slaves—one or the other. The men who made these laws did not expect them to vote; and they did not mean them to vote. The laws were made to prevent it, and did prevent it; and they cannot find fault now that men did not vote, whom they meant to prevent from voting.

The second Legislature was elected under the influence of these laws. It met in January, 1857. That was the Legislature which passed the act that called the convention. Now, Mr. President, bear in mind that Governor Geary, who was then there when that Legislature passed the act calling the convention together, disliked it, because it did not provide for a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people. He communicated with them on that subject, and he says that they told him they could not agree to put into the act a provision that the constitution should be submitted to the people; that they had had communications with their southern friends on the subject, and they could not do it. He vetoed the bill for that reason. So says the Senator from Missouri; and he says they passed it by a two-thirds vote over him. Yes, they did. What would you expect them to do? Who made them? What were they made for? They were put into power by a minority of the actual residents, aided by an invasion from abroad, for a distinct, particular purpose. They went on to carry out that purpose, and shape their course accordingly, to make a slave State there. They meant to make it so despite the opinions of the people there, or they would have submitted the constitution to a fair vote. They would not submit it to the people, because their southern friends disliked it. When the Governor vetoed the bill they persisted in it; they would have a convention, and would make no provision for submitting the constitution to the people. Why? Because the people would vote against them. Is that making a constitution by the people, and for the people? Was that a convention elected by the people? Were they acting for the people? Clearly not.

An election of delegates was made, and they met together in convention. They met in the beginning of September. They adjourned because a general election for the Legislature of the Territory came on in October, 1857. From April, 1857, the Territory had been presided over, first by acting-Governor Stanton, and afterwards by Governor Walker, who, when they had been there long enough to ascertain the real condition of the people of that Territory, gave out assurances to them that they should have a chance of voting at the October election, fairly, under the United States laws—not under the territorial acts. The people on those occasions frequently said to the Governor, as he tells us, "you cannot control these men; you have not the appointment of the judges of election; you have no control over them; if you knew them as well as we do, you would know that we could have no fairness in an election from them."

There were some other men sent there, to whom I might allude—Governor Geary and Governor Reeder. When Governor Geary was sent there, he was sent upon a strange errand. I remember I saw the man when he was here about to go, and I looked at him thinking what an errand he was sent upon; and so it is of the officers who have been sent there. They were told, "now you must execute those laws; it shall be done by the whole power of this Government; but you are to see that there is fair and ample justice done to all that people." The thing involved a palpable inconsistency, a gross impossibility. You might as well have told these men "you are to go out, you understand, to do all kindness and equity and justice to the children of Bethlehem, but you are at the same time to carry out the decree of Herod." The thing was impossible. I knew it was impossible when the man started away. I knew he would be involved in difficulty, and necessarily must be. I knew, indeed, that he made some little effort himself to get the acts which had been passed in the Territory repealed before he went, but he did not succeed; he could not get it done; the Senate would do nothing about it.

When the October election of 1857 was about to come off, Mr. Stanton first, and Governor Walker afterwards, endeavored to persuade the people to go into the election. Before that time, however, the election of delegates to the convention came on. That was soon after the arrival of Governor Walker in the Territory. He went out beset with that delusion which seems to be cherished so much about here, that there is but a little factious disturbing minority of the people of Kansas who make all the trouble—that they are in a state of rebellion! Governor Walker went there with that notion, and at first he could smell rebellion in everything. If the people associated in Lawrence to light and clean their streets, or build a bridge by common consent, he could see nothing in it but treason. He wanted a great army to environ that town; but after all, I do not know that he succeeded in shooting anybody, or that he found out any treason. He became disabused of this. So did Stanton, and so did Geary. They ascertained what the condition of the country really was when they had been there long enough to have a personal acquaintance with it, and then they began to see it in its true light, and they began to try to carry out the direction they had received, that they should do justice to the people. I say, in regard to the election for delegates to the convention, that Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton tried to persuade the people to go into it, but all the time gave them the most direct assurances, coming from the President himself, that whatever constitution the convention might form should be submitted to their vote for ratification or rejection. That was the assurance they had.

There was another element which entered into the election of delegates. The Legislature had ordered a census to be taken, and the delegates to be apportioned to the districts according to the census. A census was taken; and what I have to say of it is that in all the counties it was very imperfectly done; in many counties, and some of them very populous, it was not done at all. I know the Senator from Missouri says that the people prevented it; but how could the people prevent men from taking a census, where there was no officer to take it? Nor do I see how it is possible to prevent a man taking a census. He can inquire of the neighbors, or of anybody, who lives here? who lives there? who lives in this house? and who in that house? It seems to me a strange thing to say that you cannot take a census, cannot count the people. It is very much like the boy who could not tell how many pigs there were in a certain lot; he had counted all that were there but one, and it was a spotted one, and kept running about so that he could not count it. [Laughter.] I do not see any difficulty in counting. Where there were officers, they could have taken the census truly. Where there were no officers, the people were not to blame; but in some counties where there were officers, they did not try to take a census at all. There were some fifteen counties that were nominal counties, that did not have any census. Some of those were populous counties—populous for that country. You will perceive that that people as a body, as a mass, had no opportunity to be represented by delegates in the convention.

In the next place, it is true that the mass of the people had no confidence in the officers who were to conduct the election of delegates. They had no participation in the selection of those officers; and they were not appointed by the Governor. In the third place, the assurances which they received directly and expressly from the organs of the Government, authorized by the President himself, were such that the people said to themselves, "really we do not care very much about the convention; we do not much care about their constitution; we do not care who writes it; we do not much care what it contains; because we are assured that we shall have the opportunity to vote directly upon it; that we shall have the opportunity to reject it if we do not like it; to approve it if we do like it: that is what we are told, and therefore we need not trouble ourselves about the election of members of the convention." Were not such the assurances given? It will hardly be denied, I apprehend; but to make it perfectly clear, let me make a few quotations. The President, in his instructions to Governor Walker through the Secretary of State, on the 30th of March, 1857, said:

"When such constitution should be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

Can any thing be more explicit than this? Governor Walker, in an official dispatch to the State Department, dated June 2, 1857, said:

"On one point the sentiment of the people is almost unanimous—that the constitution must be submitted for ratification or rejection, to a vote of the people, who shall be bona fide residents of the Territory next fall."

In his inaugural address to the people of Kansas, Governor Walker declared:

"With these views well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas. My instructions from the President, through the Secretary of State, under date of the 30th March last, sustain 'the regular Legislature of the Territory in assembling a convention to form a constitution.' And they express the opinion of the President, that when such constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interfered with by fraud or violence. I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and quietly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

These were the assurances which the people received. Might they not, then, very well have said, "when the time comes for us to vote, when we may vote under these assurances, we will vote, if that fair opportunity be presented to us; but we know these men, Governor, better than you do; we doubt whether that time will ever come; but, as you say it shall come, and that the constitution will be rejected unless it does come, we will trust it; we will not make war; we will exercise no violence about it; we will trust to the assurances we have received from you as the organ of the Government, coming, as you tell us, from the head of the Government."

Is it not strange to talk of that people having been estopped? What is the doctrine of estoppel? Among lawyers it is understood to be taking some objection, by which you prevent testimony from being taken; you estop a man from examination into the truth. It is said in the books to be odious even in the law; but it is absolutely intolerable in legislation. But, sir, the doctrine of estoppel is pushed a little beyond this, and with great moral propriety, in courts of law. Wherever one man gives to another man assurances of facts upon which he knows that man is to act, and the man does act upon them, the man who gave such assurances is never permitted to dispute them. If the honorable Senator from Maine, who sits beside me, [Mr. Fessenden,] is about to buy a horse of A B, and asks me whether that is A B's horse, he knowing I once owned him, and I tell him it is A B's horse, and he buys it, the doctrine applies. How? Knowing that he was about to buy it, and giving him that assurance and permitting him to act under it, I am estopped afterwards from claiming that horse to be mine. If I could prove it to be mine I should not be permitted to do it; and this commends itself to the acceptance of every man. It is called estoppel in pais.

What was done to these people? They were told, as an assurance coming from the President of the United States, "if the convention was elected when you could not vote, or if it was called for by a vote in which you could not participate, no matter about the constitution it may make; it is to pass under your sanction, if it is ever adopted at all—then let it go." Now, sir, I ask, in all moral propriety, by the application of any sound ethics, are not this Government, this community, this Senate, as an integral part of this Government, now estopped from telling that people that they should have voted in the first place? Have we not led them into this security? Have we not given them, through our organ, these direct assurances, and induced them to act on them? Yes. Then we should be estopped from saying that they have not done as they should. It is we who should be estopped, not they. This should be the end of the complaint that the people ought to have gone and voted for the delegates.

It is very observable, Mr. President, that as long as that unscrupulous minority there, who had been installed into power by an invasion, retained power, we heard constantly in the Senate, "let there be no intervention in the Territory; we cannot interfere at all in any way; they must work it out themselves; we have turned it over to them, and they must work out their own salvation, for through much tribulation you must enter into the kingdom of Heaven; we cannot interfere at all." "Well, but," it was said, "they stole that power; and do you calculate to sustain them, and make yourselves receivers of stolen goods?" "Oh!" it was replied, "there is an estoppel; we cannot inquire into it." That went on for some time; no relief could be obtained. The people endured it. They, to be sure, made some little effort. They did what they could. They could not make any effort according to territorial law. They kept reading and reading over the assurances which their organic act contained, under which they went there. Congress told them that the people of the Territory should be left perfectly free to form their institutions in their own way. The people said: "That is English; it is all vernacular; we can read that as well as a learned man; we have not been left free thus far; we have been invaded, conquered, and subdued, passed under the yoke, and that condition of things is attempted to be perpetuated by the very laws these men have made; in short, they have us here as absolutely as ever the Samnites had the Romans in the Caudine Forks. What shall we do? Well, we will get together, inviting all to participate with us, and we will make a constitution; we will let the people vote on that; we will send it to Congress, and see if they will not accept it, for we do not despair of the justice of our country." They made the Topeka constitution. But what if they did? They made it, not organizing any government under it to be put in force, but making a Legislature, and choosing the necessary officers for an organization, altogether subjunctive, altogether conditional and preliminary, subject to the action of Congress. The House of Representatives accepted it; the Senate rejected it. They have, from time to time, continued that organization, not yet despairing but that they would be enabled to show Congress what was their true condition, and that they would obtain relief. They had nothing but vituperation and abuse from this Government. They were called by every possible name of vituperation—I was going to add, that the language of billingsgate could present. I shall spend no more time about the Topeka constitution, but pass on in the history of events.

In October, 1857, so strong were the assurances from Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton to the people, that they should have a fair election of a Territorial Legislature under the congressional law, that they finally concluded to go into it. Though they had been thus far all the while cheated and deceived by the assurances of the Government; though they had been told they should be left free and had not been; though they had often been told that they might go to Congress for redress, and did go and did not get it; though they had received assurances of fairness but did not have it; yet after all, with great forbearance, they concluded once more to make an effort, and they went into the territorial election last October. What did it disclose? The Governor received the returns. It is not necessary that I should go over them. Hundreds, thousands of fictitious names were added to the returns coming up from places where there were known to be not even a hundred voters. Then we are told—"estoppel, you must not touch it." The Governor did indeed find a way to realize in some way his assurances. He said these returns were not certified in legal form—not that he could set them aside for any corruption of substance, corrupt as he said they were. Even if every name was copied out of the Cincinnati Directory and he knew it, he said he could not touch that; but he did find in the form of the returns a chance to get rid of this fraud. But for that act of his, what would have been the effect? That people, with three to one, four to one, or five to one against the party in power, would again have been subjected to the same intolerable oppression which they had suffered for years.

That is what the election of October disclosed. It disclosed that the view of that people in relation to the tricks and frauds which would be practiced on them, and which they told the Governor would be practiced on him, were verified, and came very near being successful, too. But the election was declared. Now has come the time in October, 1857, after all this trouble, going through this chapter of suffering and of shame, when the people of that Territory have, for the first time, be come organized under their territorial act, and it is in the hands of the free-State men.

What takes place next? Immediately on that appearing, and appearing very clearly and distinctly, a part of the delegates to the convention, a bare majority of the whole number that were elected, assembled. All looked upon it that that election had settled the status of Kansas; but these men, in a spirit of desperation, apparently come together, a bare majority, enough to make a quorum, and their handiwork is before us. What was necessary to be done? To make a constitution, and to have it a State constitution. They must not submit it to the people, because the people would vote against it. So says the President. Now, who authorizes the President, or the Senate, or anybody, in the formation of a constitution, to say that the majority are factious, and therefore the minority shall govern; that the majority are rebellious, and therefore the minority shall govern? It is a violation of the very first principle of popular government. Nobody can be authorized to say that. These delegates formed this constitution but they would not submit it to the people. We all know why. It is vain and idle for a man to undertake, by special pleading, to blink the question at all. We all know why. Every man open to conviction at all, in the exercise of any moral sense and common discernment, knows the reason perfectly well, and the President does not attempt to disguise it.

In order to effect the purposes they had to do several things. In the first place, they had themselves given assurances that it should be submitted. In the next place, the Governor had given assurances that it should be submitted. Then it would not do entirely not to submit it. It must be submitted to the people in some form in order to redeem these pledges. Again, they must take care to submit it in such a form as to secure the effect they wanted any way, and at the same time keep up the appearance of having submitted it. Another point was to be effected. It would not do to submit this constitution in such a way that the legal officers of the Territory should have anything to do with the election. If the legal officers for superintending the elections, the territorial judges of election, were allowed to superintend the election on the constitution, it was known they would reject unlawful votes. They have just been appointed by the people who elected the Legislature in October; they were free-State people. They would not allow cheating and false returns, and therefore they could not be the instruments of these men; they must avoid using them.

It was also obvious that the Governor would not allow his office to be used to bolster up false returns. The old game was blocked; and they must have a new pack; the old one was known by the backs of the cards; the game could not be played any longer. Governor Walker would not allow cheating. They had tried it in the October election, and he would not let it succeed. Now, they must avoid him; there must not be any return made to him any way.

Another thing was to be done. The Legislature elected in October were to meet in January, they might meet earlier, and they might possibly pass a set of laws so that if the convention permitted the laws in operation at the time of the admission of the State under the constitution to be operative, these men might not be able to succeed in any of their purposes.

To avoid all this, they went on to provide that the constitution, as they said, should be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection, in the manner following to wit: each man was to vote "the constitution with slavery," or "the constitution without slavery;" and if a majority voted for it with slavery, it should all be adopted as it was; if a majority voted for it without slavery, then the clause which provided for the perpetuation of the existing slavery in the Territory should be continued, but no more slaves should be introduced. What is the English of all this? "Nobody is to be permitted to vote to reject this constitution. It is not to be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection, as we say, but it is to be submitted for ratification or rejection in such a manner that it cannot be rejected. In the next place, this shall be a slaveholding State in any event, in either alternative, on either horn of the dilemma, vote as the people may." Was that submitting a constitution to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection? Was that submitting even the question of whether it should be a slaveholding State or not? It clearly was neither. It was a cheat and a delusion.

Again, they provided that, instead of having the elections conducted by the regular judges of election, the lawful officers, men should be appointed by Mr. Calhoun, removable by him, and should make their returns, not to the Governor, but to Mr. Calhoun. After the convention adjourned, had finished its business, and he was thereby out of office, the votes were to be returned to him—a man who was not an officer known to the law. He cannot be impeached for his conduct in this matter; he is under no legal sanctions whatever. These instrumentalities are resorted to for the first time in the history of the country, as far as I know. I am not aware of any previous example of the appointment of officers, making returns, and supervising elections by men not known to the law, not amenable to law. I know they state, in the schedule to their constitution, that these persons should be subject to the same penalties as legal officers under the laws of the Territory. It happened that there were no laws of the Territory on the subject at that time; but if there were, these men could not be subjected to them, for that would be an act of legislation, and the convention had no power of legislation.

It will be observed that these proceedings were after the last October election. A vote was taken on the 21st of December, as ordered by the convention in their schedule. They have returned some six thousand votes as having been cast on that day; but the gentlemen who inspected them, and were present on the occasion of the opening of these votes, tell us there could not be more than two thousand of them genuine. They knew the country, knew the people, and state that fact.

Now, sir, what is Congress asked to do? We are asked to take a constitution so made, this child and result of original violence and continued fraud, and put it upon that people against their will. When they complain of fraud it is said they are estopped; and now you propose to cram this constitution into the mouths, and stuff it down the throats of the people; you will not permit them to say anything; they are estopped! That is what we are asked to do, and various reasons are given for it; but should we do it? Ought we to do it because we may find the sanctions and forms of law thrown around this proceeding? There never was a usurpation, there never was a tyranny imposed on a people which was not under the forms of law. The forms of law are the last things to give way; but should we try to shrink behind those forms, and refuse to know the truth?

The first claim on this ground, the first argument in support of this measure, is that this constitution was made lawfully. That word has various senses and applications. It may be said that anything is lawful that is not directly unlawful. If a thing is not unlawful, you may say it is a lawful act. There was nothing unlawful in the people assembling at Topeka to make a constitution. There was nothing unlawful, I take it, in the Cincinnati convention. It was a lawful meeting; that is, it was not unlawful; but that is not what we are after. The question we should be upon, and that alone which should justify the proceeding is, is it authoritative? That is the question. Suppose the convention which assembled there, waiving all other points, was assembled by a vote of all the people; it was not unlawful; but was it authoritative? That entirely depends on this question: had that convention any such authority from the source of power in the Territory, that is, the Government of the United States, as enabled them authoritatively to proceed? I insist that they had none at all.

Something is said, and more alluded to, about the treaty with France; and it is intimated that as to the country which was within the Louisiana purchase, the treaty with France gave some sort of authority for making a State. I should like to know what it is. I know that treaty provided that the people then in the ceded Territory, the French subjects who were there, (for they had no right to provide for others,) should be protected in their property. Kansas was an utter wilderness then, with no people in it. The treaty said further that they should have the privileges of citizens of the United States, and be admitted into the Union at the proper time. That is the substance of the provision. Did that authorize them to form a State constitution? There was that whole region of Louisiana, from the mouth of the Mississippi to its head, and extending west to the Rocky Mountains, all included in this purchase. Suppose there had been fifty thousand or one hundred thousand people in that vast region: would any man say that people had a right to make it into a State and that their taking proceedings by a convention for that purpose would have been authoritative? It is not true that either the whole or any part of that region, whether shaped into a Territory or not, has any such inherent power, or any such authority derived from that treaty. I undertake to say there is not a single word in that clause of the treaty but would have been equally good law if it had not been there. It was well enough to provide in the treaty that the inhabitants of the ceded country should be protected in their rights and property. That is said from abundant caution, but it is in the law of nations even if it were not in the treaty. No authority was derived from that.

Then, where did they get authority to make this constitution? Have they had any enabling act? Not at all. Did they need any under that treaty? The people of Louisiana had one; the people of Missouri had one; the people of Iowa had one. They were all within the limits of the country acquired by that treaty. If Kansas did not need any enabling acts, over what part of the ceded country did that requirement extend? Did it take in much or little? I supposed all portions had the same right. There is nothing in that treaty which tends at all to intimate that there was any such power given to that people, nor has the conduct of the Government shown any cotemporaneous construction like that, but it is directly the other way.

There is a very great importance in knowing whether a thing is done authoritatively or not. When any election is holden, or any proceeding taken by authority of law, it is totally immaterial how many people vote or how many stay at home. When the law is passed by competent authority, the vote thus given is conclusive; it is not permitted to be rebutted; no fact can be admitted against it; all the world is informed "there is the law; go and vote under that law, because you are to be bound by it at any rate; if you do not like what is to take place, go and by your vote prevent it if you can." If an election is held in any district, in any city, in any State, or in the Union, by authority, the vote passed under that authority is conclusive. I insist, however, that the Territory of Kansas never had any authority for proceeding to form a State constitution. Congress has never passed any enabling act for Kansas. I know that the President seems disposed now to say (and some gentlemen here seem disposed to affirm) that there is something to be found in the act organizing the Territory of Kansas, which amounted to an enabling act. I should like to have the words pointed out somewhere. Is an enabling act to be found in those very important words which declared that the people of the Territory should be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way? Is that it? If that is it, they might have formed a State constitution as soon as they got twenty men there. Kansas has not sufficient population for one Representative in Congress now; nor is it put on any ground of that kind; but it is said the act organizing the Territory is itself an enabling act. If so, it was an enabling act the next day after a man went there. Congress, however, never understood it as an enabling act; and the President, who signed it, never understood it so. When these difficulties arose, President Pierce recommended to Congress to pass an enabling act for the Territory of Kansas, to be put into operation whenever it should have the proper number of inhabitants. An attempt to pass an enabling act succeeded in this body during the last Congress. If Kansas already had such an act, why was that attempt made; why was that bill passed by this body? Most clearly it is left to this late day to discover, and that, too, without saying where you can find it, that the territorial act is an enabling act. I do not know but that it may be referred to some other words in the act, those which declare that the Legislature shall have power to legislate on all rightful subjects of legislation; but those words are in all the territorial organic acts. If the Kansas act was an enabling act because of those words, every territorial act Congress have ever passed was an enabling act, and they never needed any other. The practice of the Government shows that this idea is entirely without foundation. It is a mere assumption.

Then I say this proceeding was without authority; but the President and the friends of this measure keep repeating that it was done according to law. I admit that it was not unlawful; but is everything that is not unlawful, therefore authoritative? Certainly not. I do not deny that delegates may assemble in a convention to form a constitution, and the people may even vote for it, and ratify it, and organize a government under it, subjectively, conditionally, and present that constitution to Congress as a petition for admission as a State; and if Congress choose to ratify it, it is all very well. But what is the effect in such cases? Congress admit States in their discretion—I do not mean caprice—I mean a judicious discretion. When a constitution comes here formed by authority, we have simply to see whether the conditions on which that authority was granted have been complied with. There is a sort of plighted faith, "if you do so and so, we will admit you," as in the case of Minnesota; and if we find that they have done so, we ought to admit them. When, however, the act is done, as I may say in invitum, done by the people themselves without authority, then before Congress ratify it they should inquire into all the circumstances.

Arkansas came with a constitution made by a convention under the authority of the Territorial Legislature. The case was fully examined, and it was decided during General Jackson's administration, by his proper legal officer, that that had no binding force; but after all it was not unlawful; Congress might ratify it if they chose; it was a mode of petitioning. Michigan came pretty much in the same way. After a full examination those two States were admitted.

Then how does the matter stand? If a proceeding of this kind is taken in any form, it may be that prima facie we should consider that it is all right. If it is not disputed, we should receive it. If it has been fairly conducted, we should take it. If nobody objects to it, the case is prima facie good. There is a great deal in that prima facie. I have always thought it was a pretty good definition of a young lawyer who, when called upon to explain what he meant by a prima facie case, said he meant a case good in front and bad in the rear. [Laughter.] That is a true definition. This prima facie case, not made by authority, is a matter to be examined into, especially when it is questioned. On this occasion question is made. When Arkansas presented her constitution, nobody questioned it; the people there were satisfied with it. When Michigan presented her constitution, the people there were satisfied with it. When this case, however, is presented here, got up in the manner I have stated, (without my finding any other fault with it now, without going over what I have previously said,) the people do find fault with it; and we are asked to look into it and see if it is really what it purports to be. Will you look into it? will you examine whether it is fair? Resolutions were offered to this body to enable the Committee on Territories to examine it, but the Senate refused to clothe the committee with power to obtain the means of examination. I take it this is a pretty good indication of what is to be done. I am aware that the Senate do not mean to inquire. What do you mean to do? "To insist that this is authority at any rate; we will stick to it; and as to the point whether the proceeding was done fairly or not, we will not know; we are afraid that if we undertake to inquire, we shall ascertain that it is not fair, and therefore we do not mean to inquire." To my mind, this is making a very extraordinary use of the doctrine of estoppel.

There is another topic running collaterally with this to which I wish to allude. During the last four years there has run along with this proceeding another pretty important point connected with it, and that is what I call the political dogma that slave property, if you call it property, is precisely the same in legal character as any other property; being such that its owners have a right to carry it into the Territories, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. That idea began, I believe, with Mr. John C. Calhoun; and for some time after he started it, it was almost universally scouted. There were very few men found anywhere in this country who received it. It has been presented, however, on plausible grounds. It has been asked, "cannot the people of every State go to the Territories with their property all alike? Cannot a man go there from Virginia with the same property as a man from Massachusetts; and a man from Vermont go there with the same property as a man from Georgia? Certainly, all can go alike; but the property of one may perhaps be of such a kind that it cannot be carried there at all; but that is not the fault of the law. If there is any difficulty of that sort, it results from the nature of the property. It may be, if you please, tropical fruit, that would perish before you could get it there. That is the misfortune of the owner if he undertakes to carry it there; it is not owing to the law."

I come back to the question whether slave property is such as can be carried out of its State—whether it is the same as other property? Here I cannot avoid, because it is thrust continually in the way, speaking in some measure of what is called the Dred Scott decision. As I have said, the dogma of the right to carry slave property, like other property, beyond the limits of the States, at first was not received at all. Did anybody suppose that it was the correct doctrine when Congress passed laws fixing certain lines, and saying slavery should not go north of them? Did they dream of anything of that kind then? No. Even in modern times, since we obtained the territories acquired from Mexico, was it adopted as a correct doctrine? I believe in the compromise of 1850, when Congress made the law that New Mexico should be admitted, with or without slavery, when they came to form a State constitution, the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] opposed that, because it did not go far enough. He insisted that Congress should go on and repeal the existing law of Mexico, in order to let them fairly in. I am right, I believe, in that.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am certain as to that. An honorable member of the other House from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] took the same ground; and when what was called the Clayton compromise was offered in the House of Representatives, it was laid on the table, on his motion, on that very ground. This doctrine was not considered good then. It has grown up and reached its present elevation since that time. I do not propose at this time to go into a critical examination of the Dred Scott decision; I do not propose a review of it. I shall simply speak now as to this particular point. What is that decision? Is there anything authoritative in it? The Supreme Court had a case before them. The court decided, on a full hearing, that they had no sort of jurisdiction of the case, and ordered it to be dismissed, or sent to the court below to be dismissed. How came they, then, to have authority to make a decision? They had no authority, no jurisdiction, of the case. They said they had not. Clearly, whatever else they said was extra-judicial. I do not say that the Supreme Court should never pass on any political question; but I do say that it would be very much to be regretted that they should be obliged to do so. If we desire that that court shall sustain its position and command the confidence of the country, it certainly ought to be kept clear and steered clear of being obliged to break down that confidence by running across a political question which agitates the whole country. They should avoid it if they can; but it may be that a case before the court involves a question in deciding which they must pass upon it. When they must, they must. I cannot but say, after all, I should apply to such a case the words of the Prince of Denmark to the ghost:

"Thou com'st in such a questionable shape,
That I will speak to thee."

If it comes in such a shape, involved in the question that they must speak to it, very well; but nothing else can excuse it. I think it is very much to be regretted that the judges of that court, or any of them, should have thought proper to employ their extra-judicial lucubrations in putting forth ex cathedra indorsements of a political dogma. The indorsers of accommodation paper very seldom find that it is a profitable business.

They either fail to give currency to the paper, or else they have to meet it themselves.

In examining the question whether the Constitution of the United States recognizes and protects slave property, as it is claimed, the same as other property, I cannot but say that I think, in the first place, it has been disposed of by very cheap logic. Most of it is a mere assumption—an assumption, in my judgment, exceedingly arrogant in some of its forms; but I wish to give it what I believe to be a candid and honest examination; and I will not be tedious about it. I do not say that slaves are never property. I do not say that they are, or are not. Within the limits of a State which declares them to be property, they are property, because they are within the jurisdiction of that government which makes the declaration; but I should wish to speak of it in the light of a member of the United States Senate, and in the language of the United States Constitution. If this be property in the States, what is the nature and extent of it? I insist that the Supreme Court have often decided, and everybody has understood, that slavery is a local institution, existing by force of State law; and of course that law can give it no possible character beyond the limits of that State. I shall no doubt find the idea better expressed in the opinion of Judge Nelson, in this same Dred Scott decision. I prefer to read his language. He declares:

"Every State or nation possesses an exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction within her own territory; and her laws affect and bind all property and persons residing within it. It may regulate the manner and circumstances under which property is held, and the condition, capacity, and State, of all persons therein; and also, the remedy and the modes of administering justice. And it is equally true, that no State or nation can affect or bind property out of its territory, or persons not residing within it. No State, therefore, can enact laws to operate beyond its own dominions; and, if it attempts to do so, may be lawfully refused obedience. Such laws can have no authority extra-territorially. This is the necessary result of the independence of distinct and separate sovereignties."

Here is the law; and under it exists the law of slavery in the different States. By virtue of this very principle, it cannot extend one inch beyond its own territorial limits. A State cannot regulate the relation of master and slave, of owner and property, the manner and title of descent, or anything else, one inch beyond its territory. Then you cannot, by virtue of the law of slavery, if it makes slaves property in a State, if you please, move that property out of the State. It ends whenever you pass from that State. You may pass into another State that has a like law; and if you do, you hold it by virtue of that law; but the moment you pass beyond the limits of the slaveholding States, all title to the property called property in slaves, there ends. Under such a law slaves cannot be carried as property into the Territories, or anywhere else beyond the States authorizing it. It is not property anywhere else. If the Constitution of the United States gives any other and further character than this to slave property, let us acknowledge it fairly and end all strife about it. If it does not, I ask, in all candor, that men on the other side shall say so, and let this point be settled. What is the point we are to inquire into? It is this: does the Constitution of the United States make slaves property beyond the jurisdiction of the States authorizing slavery? If it only acknowledges them as property within that jurisdiction, it has not extended the property one inch beyond the State line; but if, as the Supreme Court seems to say, it does recognize and protect them as property further than State limits, and more than the State laws do, then, indeed, it becomes like other property. The Supreme Court rest this claim upon this clause of the Constitution:

"No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Now the question is, does that guaranty it? Does that make it the same as other property? The very fact that this clause makes provision on the subject of persons bound to service, shows that the framers of the Constitution did not regard it as other property. It was a thing that needed some provision; other property did not. The insertion of such a provision shows that it was not regarded as other property. If a man's horse stray from Delaware into Pennsylvania, he can go and get it. Is there any provision in the Constitution for it? No. How came this to be there, if a slave is property? If it is the same as other property, why have any provision about it?

Again, you will observe that this provision relates only to those who may escape. The horse escapes and runs away into another State, and the owner can pursue him there. Can he pursue him any better there because he escaped, than if he rode him there? If the owner rode the horse from Delaware into Pennsylvania, he could still, I take it, go home on him. He would not need any provision of the Constitution for that. But here they seemed to find it necessary to make provision that the slave should go home with the master, if he escaped. They provided only for those who escaped; and therefore, if a man takes his slave over voluntarily, this provision of the Constitution is that he cannot take him back, because it only covers those that escape. Then it is not like other property. It not only does not put it on the ground of other property, but it absolutely abnegates the idea of its being like other property. Other property he could bring away, whether it ran off or was carried off. With slaves it is different. Then it is not like other property. That recognition does not put it on the ground of other property.

In the next place, what do you mean by guarantying property to be the same as others? How is others? I take it that guarantying rights over property means, to enable the owner to take it and use it, and sell it to others to use anywhere and everywhere. But, even in relation to escaped slaves, does this provision of the constitution enable the owner of those slaves to go where they have escaped, to a free State, and there take them and keep them, and hold them, and sell them? No such thing. It only authorizes him to take them home, into and under that law where he is entitled to their service. Property he can take, keep, hold, sell, and use, anywhere. The Constitution, I repeat, only enables him, as to escaped slaves, to take them home—not to sell them and use them in the free State where he finds them.

It seems to me, on this slight view of the subject, the strangest thing in the world that anybody can say that this provision of the Constitution (and it is the only provision under which the claim is made) actually guaranties this property absolutely, makes it the same as property generally, puts it on the same footing, and guaranties ownership over it in the same degree. Obviously, clearly, and plainly, it does not; but what is it? Nothing more nor less than a recognition of the idea that one man may have interest in another man's labor under the law of a State, and that if the man owing the service escapes from that State, the person to whom he owes the service may take him back, there to be entitled to receive the advantage of that right. In short, it recognizes slavery, if property at all, to be property local within the State whose laws made it such, not an inch beyond it; and all it does is to enable a man from whom a person owing service has escaped against his will, to reclaim him. It can be carried no further than a recognition of slavery in those States where the laws make it so, to be used there and taken back if it runs away, but leaving it still precisely as it stood before. The law that makes it, makes it such only within the territory where that law exists. The moment you willingly pass out of that limit with what you call the property, it ceases to be property altogether. How, then, can you take it to a Territory? This seems to me to be an end of the assumption that it is made the same as other property by the guarantees of the Constitution. It is an assumption without any sort of foundation.

Mr. MASON. If it would not derange the Senator's line of argument, while he is on that topic, I desire to put an inquiry to him. As I understand the basis on which his present argument rests, it is the assumption that slavery exists only as the creation of positive law. I hold the very opposite; and if he has any authority on which to base his position, I should be gratified to hear it. I hold, on the contrary, that slavery is a condition only, the condition of property; that property is a condition which the slave brought from Africa, a condition recognized by the common law of this country, and therefore property ever afterwards unless abrogated by positive law.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I did suppose, though I did not know exactly whether the honorable Senator from Virginia was of that school, that it was claimed even on a higher ground; that it was not the accidental condition of the man in Africa, brought here, but that it was a Divine right, begun by authority from on high, and sanctioned by revelation. This has been claimed. I do not know that I am competent to meet these arguments and these claims of right; but when an occasion presents itself, when I have time to do so—I have other topics to advert to now—I should desire to be heard on that point. I merely desire now to say to the Senator, that if he will turn to the Dred Scott decision he will find what I have already read, and the court put this right on the ground of its local authority. Chief Justice Taney, in his opinion, says that it has been claimed and argued before the court that this condition of things is recognized as a part of the law of nations, and he utterly repudiates that whole idea. If the Senator will look at the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, he will find that the Supreme Court decided that the local law of the States where it exists, is the true foundation of the right to hold slaves; and the same decision has been made repeatedly in the State courts, even in the slaveholding States themselves; and the Supreme Court of the United States have repeatedly taken that ground. I shall not, however, notice this point now, but proceed with my argument.

In my view, the security, the safety, of the institution of slavery essentially depends, in all time, on holding it to be a local institution, the creature of local law. If the time shall ever come when this is attempted to be made a national question, to be passed upon by the people of America, it must be perfectly obvious to the very extensive discernment of the slaveholding community itself what the result must be. In this country there are less than a third of a million of slaveholders; there are nineteen millions of free white people. If it ever is to be made a national question, so that the nation may pass upon it, no man can doubt what will be the result. That can be determined by the simplest rules of arithmetic; it is a mere question of numbers. If it is intended to keep within the pale of the Constitution, to preserve the unity of the States, to sustain this Government and remain one people together, there is no way in which this institution can by possibility be preserved, but by holding it at all times to be entirely a local matter, and having its origin and existence in local law. This is the only way it can ever be protected.

It seems to me, with that view of the subject, that those gentlemen, especially from the southern States, who seem to be trying to precipitate this issue, to push on this point, to extend this institution beyond its local limits by the action of the General Government, are endeavoring to push this question upon the people as a national matter, in which they must participate, and shall participate. The decision to which I have alluded is of that kind; all these proceedings are of that kind. What result does that bring about in my mind? These men know what I have said to be true as well as I do—they know that slavery cannot be made national in this country, if you keep it together; and every effort made to precipitate an issue of that kind is not to abide by that issue, but it is when sufficient excitement has been made, when a collision has been produced, that a separation shall ensue. I can see nothing else to be the design; I do not believe in the want of discernment of those statesmen. They must look at it as I do.

But that is not all; another step is connected with it. You desire to make Kansas a slaveholding State—that is, to have the constitution so formed and adopted. You will not submit it to the people, from a consciousness that the people are opposed to it. What do gentlemen mean by such a proceeding? Suppose you were to have a constitution providing for and perpetuating slavery in Kansas? You know that the majority of that people are against it. Is that any benefit to the cause of slavery? Is it desirable to you to irritate a community by having forced on them such a state of things against their will? Are you going to get any good from that irritation? Can you have slavery there by virtue of that constitution? We all know you cannot. Suppose you have a slave-State constitution—I care not how strong and how perpetual and how incapable of change it may be—do we not know that at the very first fair election by that people a Legislature will be chosen who, when they get together, will utterly refuse to pass any laws for the protection of slave property? They will pass no act for punishing a man who may entice a negro to run away. They will declare that no master shall administer stripes and correction to a slave, except by judgment of a court, and if he does he shall be guilty of assault and battery, and the negro shall be a witness against him. What is your slave property worth if you do not pass any law for the protection of it, though the constitution provides for the right of slavery? I take it that it cannot be unconstitutional to pass such laws. They could not pronounce the failure to pass them unconstitutional. How, then, will you get along? We see there is nothing in it; and when this is pushed as it is, it must be for some other purpose, some other object.

We are told what the purpose is of pushing this constitution on that people against the will of the majority. We are told it from authority. I do not wish to quote things from mere recollection, but I will read some of the words of the President himself on that topic. The President says, in his message:

"It has been solemnly adjudicated by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, and that Kansas is therefore at this moment as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina.

"Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas except by means of a constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be done so promptly, if a majority of the people desire it, as by admitting it into the Union under the present constitution.

"The people will then be sovereign, and can regulate their own affairs in their own way. If a majority of them desire to abolish domestic slavery within the State, there is no other possible mode by which this can be effected so speedily as by prompt admission, and the Legislature already elected may, at its very first session, submit the question to the vote of the people, whether they will or will not have a convention to amend their constitution."

I would not intimate that, from so high authority as this, there was really intended to be any practical duplicity about that; I do not believe it; I do not intimate it; but I would ask southern gentlemen do they mean to admit Kansas, under this constitution, for that purpose—for the purpose of making it a free State in the most speedy manner? If they do not, if that is not what they mean to do, I think common candor would require them to disclaim it. Certain it is, that these remarks could never be expected to extend to those gentlemen. Who are these remarks intended for, then? As the common saying is, they are for the marines; they are to afford an opportunity, an excuse for men who professedly represent a free-State people to vote for it, and to get themselves intentionally deluded, as the man said he expected to be disappointed. [Laughter.]

There is some other purpose for this. No object of that kind is seriously intended, for amongst other things you will observe, that if Kansas be admitted with the Leocompton constitution, we have to adopt the State election which took place under it. "Oh! that is to be settled by their Legislature." It is? Who is to be the Legislature? Can anybody answer me? The amount of it is, whoever Mr. John Calhoun gives certificates to, will be the Legislature; whoever he elects, are elected. Can any man tell me who they will be? He knows, and will not tell. It may indeed be that, after all that has happened, and especially after the recent investigations by the committee of the Territorial Legislature, Mr. Calhoun will not think it advisable, in aid of the great purpose which he serves, to give the slaveholders, the minority there, after all their frauds and all their deceptions, the election certificates. It would be too gross, too palpable. It would not only be receiving the stolen horse, but it would be conclusive evidence of who had stolen him. Suppose he does give the free-State men the Legislature, he will give them a bare majority. Now, who shall be Governor there? Generally it is said, you cannot tell who is Governor until after the election; but here you cannot even tell after the election; no man can tell now who is to be Governor; Calhoun cannot tell himself, or if he can, he will not.

We understand distinctly that one side or the other is to be cheated. I do not intend to aid in taking that position of things by which either my opponents or myself are to be cheated; but if we adopt this constitution, we take that position. You may say that the candle-box was discovered full of votes in the wood pile back of Calhoun's office, and we can count out the votes there. But will he give certificates according to those votes? Who has any authority to decide. The returns were to be made to Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Calhoun is to decide. There is the end; there commences the estoppel. We are to be estopped now—that is the end of it. He splits the difference, as is commonly done by men who do not know how to decide either way; he gives a majority of the Legislature to the free-State people because there are most of them; and he gives the Governor to the other side because they need him. I should like to know how any constitution can ever be amended in that state of things. The Legislature undertakes to pass a law to call a convention; the Governor vetoes it. Calhoun will not certify the election of two thirds of the free-State candidates to the Legislature. They cannot overvote the Governor, and there is the end of it.

But the President says that if they are made a State, then indeed they will become an independent people, and can manage their affairs in their own way. Ah! well, that is another step in the progress of popular sovereignty. In the first place, they were to go there as people of a Territory, to manage their affairs in their own way. In the next place, they were not to do it then; but when the version given by the Cincinnati convention came out, it was that they were to be perfectly free in making a State constitution. Now they have got to that point; and you say a majority of the people shall not make a constitution at all; because, if they do, they may be likely to make the Topeka constitution, or some one that they choose. They cannot do it, then; but at last the President has got to the point, that the only way a people can form a State constitution, is to be first made into a State; and the most solemn and correct way is to pass them through the furnace of slavery, make them a State in that form, and they will then just be fitted to turn free. Besides, they can never manage their affairs in their own way, though you have told them so over and over and over again, until they can get out of the clutches of this Government. He says, when you admit them as a State, then they may manage their own affairs. Ah, indeed! that is another step in the progress of popular sovereignty. Never, while a Territory, can they manage their affairs, nor in making a State constitution, nor until they can get, somehow or other, out of the guardianship and beyond the tyranny of this Government over them, and be formed into an independent State; and then they can do as they please. It is peculiarly an advantage to them if you can make a slave constitution for them, because that will permit the people to do what they have all desired to do, and that is, make it free!

Inasmuch as this constitution was not made by authority, as I have shown, it presents itself to us as a thing done by the act of this convention, not unlawfully, and is presented here for our consideration. Now it is insisted upon at great length, that that is not an expression of the will of the people. On the face of it, prima facie, it may be so. If you stopped with the vote on the 21st of December, you might, prima facie, say, "I presume it is all right;" but when it is suggested, when it is pleaded, when it is directly alleged in the pleadings, that this is not the expression of the will of the majority of the people of Kansas, then comes the question for us to examine. Had it been by authority, it would have been conclusive. Not being by authority, but by the voluntary proceeding of the people who went into that convention, it is for us to examine into the truth of it, to ascertain whether it is the will of that people or not.

I shall not enlarge on the points I have heretofore made, but simply come to this one: on the 4th day of January last, under an act of the Territorial Legislature, a vote of the people was taken on the very question of the adoption of this constitution by authority of law, and under the sanction of the Legislature, and they voted, by ten thousand majority, against it. Whenever proceedings are taken that are not authoritative, and they present themselves to Congress for our action, how are we to act in our discretion? If it is done by authority, it is conclusive; but if not done by authority, and it presents a prima facie correct case, as was the case in Arkansas and Michigan, admit it; but when it is disputed, then it becomes a substantive fact, to be approved affirmatively. The fact to be proved is, that it does present the view of the majority of the people; not only prima facie so, but that it is in fact so, and that is to be ascertained by examination. The moment we touch this examination it shows us not merely that this is not the will of the people, and is not the desire of the majority, but it abnegates it, and shows conclusively that it is contrary to the desire of that people—not only that they are not for it, but that they reject it altogether. Why, then, do you not examine it? We are estopped, it is said; we cannot get at the truth; there is an estoppel. We, as Senators, are willfully to shut our eyes to the true condition of the people of that Territory.

I have a word now to say in relation to the report of the committee, presented by the honorable Senator from Missouri, and his remarks upon it. I cannot go into a detailed examination of its parts, but I wish to group together its leading points. It consists of three essential elements. In the first place, it is assumed that this proceeding was done by law, and is, therefore, authoritative, and that there is an end of the question. I have said all that I wish to say on that point. I say it was not done by authority; it is, therefore, not conclusive, and, of course, that leaves the subject open to our examination.

The report insists next, that the people of Kansas ought to be bound by it because they did not vote against the calling of the convention. I have explained that. The laws disfranchised them at the time that vote was taken. It is said they are estopped because they did not participate in the election of delegates to the convention. They did not choose to vote then, because of the nature of the census; because of the want of confidence in the officers who were to conduct the election; and more especially because they were assured by the Governor that whatever constitution the convention might make, they should have a right to pass upon it. They have been cheated out of that.

In the third place, the report insists that these people should be estopped and bound by this proceeding, because they did not vote on the 21st of December on the question then submitted to the people. I have explained how that submission was made. The people did not choose to be the dupes of that trickery. There is a good reason why they did not vote on that occasion. Besides, their own Territorial Legislature met before the 21st of December, and directed them to vote upon the constitution on the 4th of January. They then did vote upon it, and voted it down. They had been repeatedly assured by this Government, by its officers, that they should have that right, and they exercised it on the 4th of January. The Government should be estopped from saying that they have not acted properly in doing so.

The next ingredient in the composition of the majority report is, that everything operates by way of estoppel. Each one of these acts estops the people. I need not repeat or add to what I have already said on that point. There is nothing in the nature of the acts which could operate as an estoppel.

There is one other element, an essential one. We complain that the people of Kansas were subjugated by military force; that they have been kept in thralldom and oppression until last October; and that then proceedings were taken to make a constitution in the manner I have described. For what purpose? To frustrate the territorial government going on, when it is now, for the first time, in fair legal operation. When it was in the hands of the usurpers there could be no intervention. The moment it is in the hands of the majority of the people, intervention is loudly called for, and Congress must help it through. For what purpose? To put down a people who have taken possession of their true rights; and in order to do that, make a great deal of complaint in relation to those people. I cannot go over the report in its details; but I will state a few of the terms of reproach and vituperation employed in order to excite prejudice and get up animosity against the majority in Kansas. I find such expressions as these in the majority report: "They went there the worst of a spurious population;" "hired mercenaries of Abolition societies, trying to do what Congress had no right to do;" "committing most revolting outrages;" "creators of strife, excitement, wrangling, and disputation;" "turbulent spirits encouraged by restless fanaticism;" "Abolition agitators and disturbers, habitually setting all law at defiance;" "contumacious." I extract these few epithets from the report. This is one of the elements which is interwoven with, and enters into, the warp and woof of the whole of this report. I have no answer to make to such charges. I simply present them.

I think, Mr. President, that for the reasons which I have already given, this constitution ought not to be received by us, and enforced upon an unwilling people. It is a violation of the very first principles of our Government. If we do it, we directly give countenance to all the violence and fraud out of which it has grown; we crown them with success; we encourage their repetition. But that is not all. In a popular Government like ours there are two very important points to be considered in the transaction of all public business. One is to do everything right, and the other is to do it in such a way that the community can see it is right, so that public confidence may be preserved. Our Government is based on public confidence. The moment we lose it, we lose our hold on the people; we lose our support; we are without foundation. The object of a great many is to make peace. Make peace by doing what? Doing injustice. Can any man suppose that peace is to be obtained—I mean satisfactory quiet, such as an intelligent people may be satisfied with—by acts of violence and injustice, or by giving countenance to, and crowning with success, acts of violence and injustice? If we make a peace in that coercive manner, we make it at quite too dear a rate. We may buy it at too dear a price. We buy it at the price of forfeiting the confidence of every man who desires to see justice in the councils of his country.

Such men lose confidence in us when they see the highest departments of this Government taking advantage of and snatching at an opportunity to make peace when they have done it without regard to the true justice of the case and the true principles of our Government. When such things are done in high or low places no final peace can be secured by them; or if it is, it is secured at too great a sacrifice, at too high a price. It will stir the whole community who fairly examine this matter, and excite in them different emotions as men are differently constituted. But, sir, one thing is clear, that if we do it we weaken the allegiance of the people of this country to ourselves; they can no longer see in us the impersonation of justice and truth and right. I say its effect on a Government conducted like ours is that prayers and tears and secret curses sap its moldering base and steal the pillars of allegiance from it.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate upon this subject, but I shall not be able to finish to-day what I propose to say.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I will move to go into executive session, in order that he may have the floor for to-morrow morning.

Mr. GREEN. I desire first to present the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday, and to move that it be printed. At the same time I wish merely to remark on the criticism of the Senator from Vermont as to the terms used in the report, that he will find they are all justified by extracts taken from Governor Walker and his friend Governor Stanton.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to reply to that, but I can merely say now that when those men made those remarks, they were in the "gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity."

Mr. GREEN. That may be true; but they were fit subjects to go over to that side.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senator from Missouri to accept an additional section to his amendment.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The Secretary read: "A bill for the admission of the States of Kansas and Minnesota into the Union"

Mr. STUART. The reading of the whole amendment is objected to by gentlemen around me. Let it be printed.

Mr. WADE. Let it be read.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Ohio read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is what we desire to hear.

The Secretary read Mr. PUGH's amendment as follows:

Sec. — And he it further enacted, That the admission of the States of Minnesota and Kansas into the Union by this act shall never be so construed as to deny, limit, or impair the right of the people of the said States, with the assent of their Legislatures severally, and at all times, to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, so that the same be still republican and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

The amendments of Mr. GREEN and Mr. PUGH were ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time consumed therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE D. CUMMINS, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was on seconding the demand for the previous question upon House bill No. 311, fixing the number and compensation of clerks, messengers, pages, and laborers, of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Before we proceed to the consideration of the regular order, I ask the consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which I have given notice, for reference only. It is a bill of very great interest to a large portion of the State of Missouri.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not object to that; but after it is disposed of, I shall insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. It is a bill to continue, temporarily, certain land offices in the State of Missouri.

Mr. EDIE. If objection is going to be made, it may as well be made now, and I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of its assistant clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill of the House to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether the unfinished business of yesterday is not the business in order to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so announced.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish, if it be in order, to move to postpone that business till Monday next, with a view to call the committees for reports; and after the call shall have been concluded, I wish to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order, pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the demand for the previous question be withdrawn, will my proposition be in order?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think this bill may be postponed by general consent.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, then, I hope that by general consent this business will be postponed until Monday next, so that we may get at the reports of committees.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As a matter of compromise, I propose to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the amendments, and to make it a special order.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to object to anything that accords with the wishes and suits the business of the House. But the Committee of Accounts conceive that they have made a practical report, not one for Buncombe, and that the bill which they have reported should be acted upon, so that we may know the views of the House, and be able to guide our future action thereby.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman had the floor yesterday, and made a speech on this bill. I object to his occupying the floor again.

Mr. MASON. Have I not a right to do so under the rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have a right to close the debate after the previous question shall have been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to the postponement of the consideration of the question.

Mr. MASON. Then I want the floor now.

Mr. GARNETT. I ask whether there is now pending a motion to recommit to the Committee of Accounts with instructions to report the facts; and to let us know whether it is proposed to employ more or less than are now employed; and what salaries are proposed to be reduced?

The SPEAKER. There is such a motion pending.

Mr. BOCOCK. I understand that, under the decision of the Chair, it would be too late to ask for a division of the question after the previous question is seconded. I believe that this is a bill of various sections; and I desire, if the House sustains the previous question, and if the bill be not recommitted, that we may be able to have a vote on each separate section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would not avail the gentleman from Virginia to ask a separate vote.

Mr. BOCOCK. I thought that under the decision of the Chair a separate vote could be had on each section, if it was called for before the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Not on a bill. The question is, whether it shall be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was there an objection to making this a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There was. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] asked that the regular order be enforced.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the previous question be seconded, will not the first question be on referring to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first on referring to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MASON. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will be disposed of now. I do not desire to make a long speech, or to answer all the objections that have been raised; but simply to state some plain facts on which the House can form its own judgment. The House heard yesterday the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES] showing how the last House of Representatives was managed by the clerks, messengers, and other employés of the House, through a feast of oysters, and wine, and other good things. They got up this feast in order that they might get voted to each of them from $200 to $5,700. I want to know whether the House will consent to be governed in this way, or whether it will support the Committee of Accounts in the reform they have proposed?

Now, sir, I have no objection to the prosperity of Mr. Barclay, your Journal clerk; but there are sixteen thousand constituents of mine who have as much right to get $5,700 out of the Treasury of the United States as Mr. Barclay has—who have as much right to the $360 extra as these other clerks. And there are thousands of little boys at home who have an equal right to be voted $200 out of the Treasury as the boys on this floor have. But they cannot get here, and cannot get up feasts of oysters and wine for the purpose of influencing men who should scorn such considerations. I take it, sir, that the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is correct; and that the resolutions in question were passed in that way. But the accounts under them have been rejected at the Treasury. And why? Because they were in conflict with a law of Congress prohibiting the payment of extra compensation. I was told by one of my colleagues from Kentucky that he asked for the yeas and nays on one of these resolutions, and could not get them ordered.

Now, if the Committee of Accounts is to be defeated in their effort to carry out this measure, I ask that I may be replaced on that committee by some other gentleman who will carry out the present order of things more willingly than I. I do not profess to be better than other men, or to be governed by purer or better motives than other men are. But no matter what my motives are, I have a regular system and course of conduct; and under it, if I cannot succeed in enforcing common honesty, I will not, at all events, tolerate common thieving. If this is the definition of common honesty—to give every person what he wants—and it is the view and wish of the majority of this House to carry this system out, then I am content that the House should carry it out through some other organ than me.

I will now answer the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH] who has asked for a synopsis of the number of clerks employed, and their salary. Some gentlemen seem to have got the idea into their heads that we have gone this whole business blind. Here, sir, is a statement from the Clerk's office of the number of persons employed there. Is there any use in printing it when I find that three fourths of those who spoke yesterday had not read even the bill reported by the Committee of Accounts, which has been printed for some days? for they charged directly that we had reduced the price paid to the pages. I know from that they had not read the bill. What, then, is the use of having this statement printed for the benefit of the Public Printer or any one else? And when gentlemen who have not taken the trouble to read the bill charge that we went it blind in reporting this bill, I tell them that we have examined this subject, not with a view of punishing or rewarding anybody, but for the purpose of giving such officers and such compensation as, upon consultation with the officers of the House, we have found sufficient for carrying on the business of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me, I desire to ask whether the list he has is of the employés under the present Committee of Accounts since the force has been reduced, or the force under the old Doorkeeper?

Mr. MASON. This list is of the persons employed by the Clerk of the House. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUFFIN] has examined particularly into the employés under the Doorkeeper and in the folding-room. We divided out the different branches of the subject among the different members of the committee, and have examined the whole matter minutely. The statement before me relates exclusively to the employés in the Clerk's office.

Mr. FLORENCE. I thought the statement of the gentleman had reference to the force in the folding-room. I understand that the Committee of Accounts have greatly reduced the number of persons employed there, and have reduced their compensation, or at least have changed the system of their compensation, to a great extent; and I desired to know whether the comparative statement from which I supposed the gentleman was about to read would not show, which I understand is the fact, that the reforms suggested here have already been accomplished by the reduction of the force employed, and the reduction of compensation.

Mr. MASON. I understand the object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I will refer him to the gentleman from North Carolina, who is prepared to answer him fully, as I understand. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina, if he desires to answer.

Mr. RUFFIN. I will state the alterations which it is proposed to make in the force employed by the Doorkeeper—what number of employés have been in office there, and the number it is proposed to employ hereafter.

Mr. FLORENCE. That does not answer my question. I desired to know what was the force employed under the Doorkeeper of the last Congress, and the number employed since the Committee of Accounts have reduced it.

Mr. RUFFIN. That is exactly what I propose to do.

Mr. FLORENCE. I understand what this bill proposes to do. I have read the bill. I am not obnoxious to the charge of the gentleman from Kentucky against members of this House, that they did not know on what they were acting. I understand the whole thing thoroughly and intimately.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman from North Carolina will answer the gentleman's question, if he will allow him to go on.

Mr. RUFFIN. We propose to allow the Doorkeeper to remain at his present salary of $2,160 a year. We propose to allow the superintendent of the folding-room to remain at his present salary of $1,800. There was an appropriation made on the 3d day of March, 1857, for an officer not known to the law, under the title of "messenger in charge of the Hall," at $1,740 per annum. We propose to reduce the salary of that messenger to three dollars per day, and put him upon the same standing with the other messengers. There was an appropriation in the general appropriation bill at the same session, of $1,752, for a superintendent of the document-room, and the same amount for the salary of an assistant superintendent of the document-room. These officers are unknown to the law; but have crept in under former appropriation bills. We propose to reduce the compensation of each to three dollars per day. There were then five messengers for which an appropriation was made in the same bill at a compensation of $1,500 a year each. We propose to reduce these to three dollars per day. There were eight messengers appropriated for in the same bill, at a compensation of $1,200 a year each. We propose to reduce these to three dollars per day each.

The resolution reported by the chairman of the special committee appointed in the early part of the session, authorized the Doorkeeper to employ six additional messengers at a salary of $1,200 a year. All these, Mr. Speaker, the superintendent of the folding-room, the superintendent and assistant superintendent of the document-room, the messenger in charge of the Hall, the messengers at $1,500 a year, and all the messengers at $1,200 a year were permanent messengers to be continued through the entire year. We propose, in lieu of this, to employ these twenty-five messengers, fourteen of whom are to be employed during the entire year at three dollars per day, and the others to be employed during the session of Congress at three dollars per day.

I will say that we have put down the number of messengers as large as it is, because this Hall is a large one, and the number of doors in it requires a larger force than when the House sat in the old Hall; and yet the decreased salary which we have recommended will reduce the aggregate expenses of that department.

We found fourteen lawful pages on the floor and thirty-one actually here. We propose in this bill that the number to be employed shall be hereafter fixed at twenty. The law authorizes the employment of three laborers, two of whom shall continue through the year, and the other during the session only. The special committee of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] was chairman, authorized the appointment of six additional laborers, (making nine in all,) of whom four were permanent and five during the session. We propose to allow these to remain as at present.

As for the folding-room, about which the gentleman from Pennsylvania inquired, there is a superintendent appointed at his present rate of salary. The other employes are classed as messengers; but the Doorkeeper is allowed to employ one or two of the twenty-five messengers authorized to be appointed, to assist in keeping the books and perform clerical duties, during the session, under the supervision of the Committee of Accounts. We found as high as twenty-eight men employed in that room, at $2 50 a day each. Most of them were regular appointments. We reduced the number to four men, at $2 50 a day each, and two laborers, at $1 50 a day each. The four men are to get the books together, after having marked them, and to send them to members' rooms. They are to superintend the work, and to see that it is done properly. When at leisure, they go into the folding-room, and assist to put up books. The folding is to be done by the piece, and exactly as it was done before the existing system was adopted—a system adopted two years ago, and adopted, no doubt, for the purpose of conferring patronage. The twenty-eight men there now are in each other's way. The whole work of the room was formerly done by four men; and, on very pressing and busy occasions, by eight. Now persons are continually coming before us with accounts certified, some by the old superintendent, and some by the new one—for there have been two or three in the last twelve months—and it is impossible for us to tell exactly who is, and who is not, entitled to compensation. One will say that he is entitled to the pay, for he did the work; another man has got the appointment, and he wants the pay, although he may never have done any work. A man applied to us for pay, and got it, although he was sick all the time. These are the abuses in the folding-room. We have reduced the force to what we deem to be proper.

I have stated the force employed here by the Doorkeeper, and I hope the thing is understood. The names of six messengers were sent before the committee, but we did not pay them. We did not think it was right, and put the matter off. We did not act on it. I am ready to answer any questions on the subject.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I did not hear the number the committee recommended.

Mr. MASON. They recommend twenty-five messengers under the Doorkeeper; fourteen permanent and eleven temporary.

Mr. LOVEJOY. How many are there in the folding-room?

Mr. MASON. Four messengers and two laborers permanent, and the remaining work is to be done by the piece, as it has been done heretofore. As suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] addition to this force is left to the discretion of the committee. Sometimes, as he remarked, there is a necessity for a much larger force than that provided. At a session before a presidential election there is a great deal more work to be done than at any other time. Then, in the discretion of the committee, the force may be increased. It was increased at the last session, and the Doorkeeper continued it at this session, when the necessity for it had ceased to exist. The committee has done away with it.

The gentleman from Tennessee has inquired as to the clerical force of the House. Before replying, I will make the remark that as yet no member has objected that officers could not be employed here at the salaries we have agreed upon. Some members object that it will cut down the salaries of some of the clerks. None object that men could not be employed at the price fixed. It is certain that if you take the prices we have fixed, then there will not be a surplus sufficient to enable the clerks to employ substitutes; and it is a good system wherein they are prevented from doing so. The salaries fixed in this bill are adequate to employ men who are anxious and capable of discharging the requisite duties. We can obtain men at these salaries with steady hands and willing hands, who will not be above the work confided to them. I give my own experience as well as that of other gentlemen. I was chairman of the Committee of Accounts, commencing eight years ago. I was then acquainted with almost every employe about this Capitol. The messengers then received $2 12½ a day, and they were in number then not one half what they are now. They did five times as much work, and they did it well and to the satisfaction of members. There was no trouble or complaint of them. I never heard, when the salaries were at the price I have named, that our committee rooms and our document rooms were robbed of the public property. When the officers are paid high salaries, high enough to employ substitutes, and they go off and leave the public property in charge of these substitutes, we can hardly expect anything else. We have five committees looking into the doings of the last Congress. My opinion is that we should set our own house to rights, and be pure ourselves, before charging evil practices upon others.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would inquire whether our own Doorkeeper is not unjustly and falsely before a committee of this House, under the charge that he is selling places here—places that are so desirable that people are willing to buy them?

Mr. MASON. I know nothing of the charge.

Mr. FLORENCE. It strikes me that to prevent men from stealing, we should pay them enough to live upon.

Mr. MASON. I will answer the gentleman.

Let us pay our officers enough to live upon, but not enough beside to enable them to employ substitutes, who are not to be depended on.

Mr. BURNETT. By the fourth section of the bill I see that it is proposed to give five clerks $1,800 a year, three clerks $1,400 a year, and four clerks $1,200 a year. I understand that the duties of these clerks, except the enrolling and engrossing clerks, are precisely similar. If they are, then why the necessity for this classification of $1,800 clerks, $1,400 clerks, and $1,200 clerks?

Mr. MASON. Well, the gentleman says that he has understood that these clerks do the same or similar services, and have the same responsibility, and are paid different prices; and he asks why that is done? In the first place, I can tell him that he is misinformed as to the services they have to render. There are eight clerks here who are left by the bill at the salaries which they have heretofore received. We do not reduce them at all. They remain as heretofore; but I understand that none of them have resigned because the pay was too small. I understand, on the contrary, that one of them who was discharged has been very glad to get back again.

Mr. FLORENCE. On the principle, I suppose, that half a loaf is better than no bread.

Mr. MASON. No, sir; but because the salary, which was $1,500 under Whig rule, and was raised to $1,800 under Democratic rule, has been subsequently raised to $2,160. But having answered the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire now to answer my colleague. We place five of the principal clerks in the Clerk's office at $1,800, and two at $2,160. That was the rate at which they have been heretofore paid. Their salaries were increased to that rate by adding twenty per cent. to their salaries several years ago, in consequence of the advanced prices of living in Washington. Sir, the price paid would command the best services in the country in this department; and they, and you, and I, and everybody, may be well assured of that. If you put the pay at a rate which will command the best services in the country, is not that high enough? If you put it higher than that, what is the consequence? You put the pay at patronage prices. You put the prices so high that a Clerk is elected here, like the President, to administer patronage and dispose of high-salaried offices. And so it is with the Doorkeeper. Members of Congress go to the Doorkeeper to ask patronage for their friends. I do not know that they bow obsequiously to him to obtain appointments, but I know that the Doorkeeper is almost as much beset as is the President himself in distributing the loaves and fishes that come under his care. You put the Clerk and the Doorkeeper in the position of distributors of patronage, instead of fixing the salaries at a rate that will command the best services in the country. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] objects to this bill, and to any decrease of these salaries. Why, sir, the Governor of his own State—a gentleman who has been a member of this House, one who has a high reputation for military achievements, a true and honest man—gets only $1,500 a year. The chief justice of the supreme court of his State gets only $1,200; for all the mental and physical labor of presiding over the court of last resort of the State of Illinois, he gets only $1,200 a year; whilst you give your common messengers here $1,500 or $1,750.

But my colleague asks me why we put three of these clerks at $1,500 and the others at higher salaries? We do it because the other five have the direction of the three; and those who have the direction of others are certainly entitled to a higher rate of compensation for the additional care and responsibility entailed on them. Then, there are four other clerks who were formerly messengers, but were sometimes employed as copying clerks. The Clerk told us that he should prefer that they should be called clerks, because he said that he could employ their services better as clerks than messengers; so we put them down as clerks and gave him three additional messengers. If we have not understood the Clerk of the House upon the subject, it is because he has not chosen to be communicative to us. We asked him privately to aid us in this thing, and he made some suggestions. We supposed that we had given him a sufficient force, and that he could command the services necessary in his department for the prices fixed in

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 59.

this bill. And no one will doubt that that is the case; he will not dare to dispute it.

Mr. BURNETT. The reason why I asked my colleague why this classification of clerks had been made, is this: I am opposed to the classification of clerks, and I have been opposed to it ever since I have seen the operation of it in the Departments in this city. You may go into the various Departments here and you will find that the clerks who receive $1,200 actually do more labor and perform more service than those who are in the classes above them. The clerkships in the Departments are divided into four distinct classes, at $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800. Now, I am opposed to this system, for the reason that, if you put some of these clerks at $1,400 and others at $1,800, those at the lowest rate of pay will render services of a similar character and do the same amount of labor as those who receive the higher rate of pay.

Mr. MASON. I yielded to the gentleman for a question, and not for an argument.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, I desire to ask another question. What direction have the five clerks who are placed at $1,800 over the three clerks who are to be paid $1,400?

Mr. MASON. It is too long an explanation to make now; but I will refer the gentleman to the report of the Whig investigating committee, made in 1841, in reference to the duties of all these clerks; and now I will proceed to something else. This is one of the very few sessions of Congress that members have had their attention called to the employés of the House. There was one committee appointed at the beginning of the session to report, among other things, as to appointing extra messengers. These messengers were allowed by the House; but the Doorkeeper was not satisfied with the number. He did not think he was allowed exactly enough, or given enough of patronage. As to these $1,200 clerks, I will say to my colleague, that, for the duties which they are called upon to perform, there can be had perfectly competent men, who will be glad to get that salary. As to the five superior clerks, their duties are of a higher order, and require higher abilities.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to know from the gentleman from Kentucky what employés under the Doorkeeper have farmed out their places? I have asked the Doorkeeper whether any such system exists in his department, and he says there does not. I have asked Mr. Allen, the Clerk, whether any such system exists in his department, and he says, no.

Mr. MASON. I did not say that they farmed out their places. I say that it is a common thing for persons employed about the Capitol to go home, and draw their pay, and get others to do their work, giving them half a dollar a day to take care of the rooms.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman say who these employés are, and I will go for their removal.

Mr. MASON. I have no charge to make against the Clerk or Doorkeeper, or anybody else. It is the system that I allude to. It is a common thing, as is known to many members of the House. Now, the only question is, whether we shall employ messengers at salaries which will make the offices objects of patronage, which will induce members to look for them for their brothers-in-law, nephews, and other relatives; or whether we will affix such salaries to the offices as will induce none to seek them who do not intend to perform their duties faithfully? As it is, we hold out inducements to office-seekers in all parts of the country to come here and seek these petty offices.

Gentlemen say why do you not commence the reform at other and higher offices? Why do you not go to the public printing system, the Army, the Navy, and the Indian department, where millions are expended, and reform them? Sir, I tell you to-day that if I were on the Committee on Printing, I would, in some contracts, effect a saving of more than a million dollars. You have had here this session a deficiency bill for printing of $790,000. But the opposition to this measure does not rise from the feeling in favor of those holdings subordinate offices. It has another source.

Mr. NICHOLS. I understand the gentleman to say that if he were on the Committee on Printing he could make contracts which would save the Government a million dollars? I now ask him what contract he would make under the law by which he would do so?

Mr. MASON. I will tell you.

Mr. NICHOLS. Allow me one word more; and then answer all together.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not perceive the pertinency of the point to this bill, No. 311.

Mr. NICHOLS. Inasmuch as the question has been started, I simply desire to put an interrogatory. I say that the Committee on Printing has but one contract to let, and in this Congress they have let it at least fifty per cent. below that at which it was ever let before.

Mr. MASON. I answer the gentleman that I would, every time that a motion to print was brought up here, examine it.

Mr. NICHOLS. Certainly. So we do.

Mr. MASON. And I would see who got it up, and for what reason it was got up; whether it was to give patronage to the printer or to give information to the country. You have now got a million of dollars added on to the contingent fund, in the form of a deficiency for printing, lithographing, and engraving, done at double and treble prices.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Kentucky had better confine himself to the discussion of the bill.

Mr. MASON. I am an old soldier on this Committee of Accounts, and I know the source from which this opposition comes. In the face of examining committees, with regard to the late Committee of Accounts and others, we determined to keep our tracks clear. And how? Why, we refer the accounts of Democratic printers to the Republican members, so that these accounts may have a full and impartial examination. We do this, even at the risk of falling out with our Democratic friends. We believe that the Republican members of that committee have a right to look at the accounts of Democratic officers. We have a Democratic Superintendent of Public Printing, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and we do not mean to prevent the full investigation of his accounts. We have intrusted that duty to members of the committee who stand high, not only in the estimation of their own party, but of the Democratic party also. If the Superintendent of Public Printing cannot stand the test of such examination, let him suffer the consequences.

So it is with the accounts of the Clerk. I do not intend to insinuate anything against the Superintendent of Public Printing. I am confident that he will be able to stand the test of a strict examination. I do not know him, but I have confidence in the President that he would not appoint a dishonest man. It is a position that requires honesty, ability, and integrity to fill. In making these contracts for millions for printing, paper, and lithographing, they are exposed to temptations which would try the honesty of any man. But, sir, if by any chance any suspicion should fall upon his conduct, let his accounts be carefully and rigidly examined by men of the opposite party in this House, and you will have no need hereafter for future committees of investigation. If the Committee of Accounts do their duty properly, and examine those accounts fairly, there can be none. It is true that some incorrect accounts may slip through, but they will be found out sooner or later. But if you want your Committee of Accounts to be governed by a caucus of employés, who shall act upon the principle of passing upon every man's accounts, then appoint some more supple tools on the committee, who will put their demands into effect, and will not allow friend or foe to look into their accounts.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] spoke of splendid committee rooms. Well, sir, who furnished them so splendidly? I cannot tell. We have their accounts coming before us occasionally. It is the duty of the Clerk of the House to bring them before us. At the proper time, they have all to be scanned by our committee, by men of all parties. If they are right, they will pass; if they are not right, they will not pass. And so with all the other accounts. It is his duty to make contracts, and to purchase all the stationery and materials for the use of the House. So far as I know, he has so far performed every duty efficiently and honestly. But, sir, for some reason the Superintendent of Public Printing has not shown a disposition for carrying on a proper investigation by the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] can testify that we have undergone an amount of labor in the investigation of the contracts which have been made for printing, lithographing, and almost everything else, which few members of the House would be willing to undergo.

Mr. Speaker, so much for the clerks and messengers. Now for the post office department. I have in my hands a report from the Postmaster of the House, which is too long to read. It would take an hour to do it. But, sir, he gives the committee his views, and asks for some more employés. He says that more employés are wanted to discharge the duties of that office. Since the salary of these messengers has been raised to $1,440 per annum, their number has been increased. When these men were employed at $2 50 per day, they did their work without difficulty with a less number. But when their salary was increased to $1,400, they employed men to do their work at $900. It is said that, in the condition of the city, they want protection in carrying the mail to the residences of the members. Well, sir, we have given them two messengers at three dollars per day to go with the mail-boys.

But, sir, the Postmaster, in his communication asking for another messenger at $900 a year, furnishes an argument against the whole system. He says the authority to make the appointment would give rise to so much competition that he would rather the appointment would be given to another. Well, sir, if there would be so much competition with the salary of $900 a year, what would it be with a salary of $1,440? The $540 must be, then, regarded as extra. Mr. Speaker, each of your constituents and mine are as much entitled to a gratuity of $540 as these men who are required to do public service. But, sir, I promised to yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I merely wish to remind the gentleman of a question I propounded, believing that the knowledge involved in its answer is necessary to enable gentlemen to vote intelligently upon this bill. I desire to ascertain what changes this bill makes? What is the reduction it proposes in the number of employés, and in their compensation? It strikes me that this information is necessary to enable us to vote understandingly.

Mr. MASON. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure, so far as I can. There is no change made in the number of the clerks now authorized by law. In some instances where messengers have, without authority of law, come to be recognized as clerks, we have put them back where they were before. We added one more to the Postmaster's force. We gave to the four men under him the pay that we have allowed messengers upon this floor. We put doorkeepers and all upon the same footing of three dollars a day. Heretofore, in previous sessions, the salary was two dollars and a half a day. The twenty per cent. increase made it three dollars, and this we have allowed them. We make the compensation such as intelligent and faithful working men in this country would be glad to obtain. We patiently inquired into the subject, and gave the force and the pay that we thought each portion of the service of the House was entitled to. We gave a compensation which we thought would insure faithful service.

We gave the Postmaster one more than he has now, for this reason. The southern men wanted a mail delivered in addition to the mails now sent to them. The Postmaster said that his force was equal only to the present service, and that it would take another wagon and horse to perform this service. After an examination, we thought that this service was necessary, and we allowed another messenger at three dollars a day, and a horse and wagon at $2 50 a day during the time of service.

The gentleman from North Carolina has explained fully in reference to the Doorkeeper's employes.

I would not have this bill put upon its passage, were it not that I know gentlemen have not read the bill which was printed and laid before them. They will not go through these long reports any more a week hence than they will now. I am not obnoxious to the charge of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN,] that this measure is pressed to make capital at home. I need no such capital. I do not wish to put the Government to the expense of publishing a large amount of these reports. They have been already published. Gentlemen who may desire it will get whatever of knowledge there is on the subject from the report in the Whig House of Representatives, made in 1841. The principles set forth in that report are as good now as they were then. Under that report, the men who were appointed discharged the duties of their offices themselves, and did not allow them to be discharged by substitutes.

Why should this question be postponed? Is it of such magnitude and importance? Does it involve millions? Is it of such character that it should not be considered now? Let it be done now. If it works badly, why next December we can change it again. If it works well, then we shall have discharged a simple duty, and in doing this, we may set an example to the other departments of the Government. It may induce them also to pursue a system of economy. And who can doubt that unless we have virtue and economy in our republican system of Government we shall lapse into corruption and ruin at no distant day? Let us take the beam out of our own eye before we look to the mote in the eye in another branch of the Government. When we have set our own house right, we will be in better condition to look into the affairs of other branches of the Government.

The question recurred on the motion that the subject be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RUFFIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Avery, Billinghurst, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Brantly, Buntin, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clingman, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Curry, Danrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dinwiddie, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Grainger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Mott, Nichols, Phelps, Pottle, Reilly, Russell, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thompson, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, and Wortendyke—100.

NAYS.—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Bliss, Boeck, Bonham, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Case, Clay, Cobb, Codde, Cragin, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Dick, Dodd, Elliott, Faulkner, Fenton, Gartrell, Gilmer, Gidd, Goodwin, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kilgore, Knapp, Lenoir, Letcher, McQueen, Mason, Miller, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Moss, Niblack, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Pike, Potter, Quintman, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—85.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Pending the above call,

Mr. PETTIT stated that he had paired off with Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES stated that Mr. TALLOR, of Kentucky, was detained at his room by illness.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. WARREN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is not the motion to reconsider debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to know whether it is in order to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of the subject, and that it be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the House is desirous to receive reports from committees I will not make the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We are anxious to make reports. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will not make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until the morning hour has expired.

Mr. SEWARD. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House referred Senate resolution No. 3, to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to dropped and retired naval officers," to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, at the time I made the motion to reconsider I did so to accommodate some gentlemen of the Naval Committee, who were at the time absent from the House.

Mr. BLISS. Let us hear the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution of the Senate was taken up some time since, read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Georgia moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was so referred. He now calls up that motion to reconsider.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman from Virginia desires to debate the resolution, let the reconsideration take place, and let it be made the special order for some day certain. I shall then be happy to hear the gentleman. I do not desire to force this measure upon the House. The joint resolution has not yet been printed; and in order that members may understand it, I desire that it shall be printed and made the special order for some day certain.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will state that I am entirely disposed to arrange this matter in any manner that may be convenient to the gentleman or to the House. I think the joint resolution is in a very proper position in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There it can be amended, and I have a substitute which I desire to offer. I rose, therefore, for the purpose of moving to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. That will leave the measure in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I will send my substitute up so that it can be printed with the joint resolution, and then the gentleman from Georgia can fix any day he chooses for the consideration of the propositions.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to that. I hope the House will make the joint resolution the special order for Tuesday next, and order it, together with the substitute, to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the motion of the gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Georgia as making any motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and that the bill and substitute be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I trust the gentleman will withdraw that motion. I will renew it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of course, the substitute of the gentleman from Virginia cannot now be received, inasmuch as the joint resolution is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to say but a few words upon the pending question. I am opposed to the motion to reconsider. I think the joint resolution was properly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It ought not, in my judgment, to pass this House.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to say that I made the motion to reconsider, to accommodate the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, supposing that I could control it at any time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio desires to discuss the pending question. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia desires its postponement. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move to postpone this subject until Monday next, or some other day, so that the committees may now be called for reports.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have no objection to the motion to reconsider being postponed.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman does not understand my proposition. I ask the House to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. After the reconsideration shall have taken place, I propose to make the joint resolution the special order for Tuesday next, and to have it printed. The gentleman from Virginia can get his substitute in, and have it printed also.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I cannot accede to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, that the vote shall be reconsidered, because I think the contest should be made on the motion to reconsider. I think that the joint resolution has been properly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it should be discussed on its merits on the motion to reconsider. I do not wish to discuss the question now; and if the motion to reconsider is to be laid upon the table, I do not wish to enter into the discussion at all; and for the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. MILLSON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELSEY called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MILLSON called for tellers on the motion to lay on the table.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. EDIE and LETCHER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 67.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The question is now, I suppose, before the House on reconsideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The question is on referring to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is the motion that was reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The vote just taken was on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. The question on reconsideration is still pending.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That, I believe, opens the merits of the proposition for consideration. I desire to submit a few observations on the measure itself—and a very few.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from Maryland to allow me to make a motion to postpone the question to some other day. The committees are all, or many of them, ready to report; and I have a great desire, after the call of committees, to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will not detain the House long; and I prefer, if my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me, to submit now the very few observations that I desire to make; and then the gentleman can make any motion he may desire.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress before the last passed what was in my judgment a very wise bill, for the purpose of purging the Navy of the United States of its rotten material. That bill was one which originated with the Secretary of the Navy, of all men the person most conscious of the necessity of reform. That bill was passed by the lower House by an overwhelming majority. It was passed by the Senate, likewise, by a very great majority. The lower House added to the bill, as it came from the Secretary of the Navy, what is ordinarily termed the drop clause—that portion of the bill which directed, not authorized, the board to drop from the list of the Navy not only all persons who were incompetent to perform their duties, but all who had rendered themselves incompetent by their own default. The last Administration organized the board, whose duty it was—not to be performed or disregarded at their pleasure—honestly and fearlessly to carry out the provisions of that law. The last Administration, with a discernment which, in my judgment, did it the highest credit, selected from the officers of the Navy a board of fifteen, as much above impeachment as any fifteen gentlemen who could have been selected from the active list of the service. These gentlemen met to discharge their duty, and on their honor and their conscience so discharged it that the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, and the whole Cabinet, approved of what the board did, recommended that the Senate should acquiesce in it, and there left the matter. A great cry was raised in the country the moment it was found how deep the knife had gone into the materials of which the personnel of the Navy is composed.

A great cry was raised that injustice had been done; that men had been stricken down without an opportunity of being heard; that small personal considerations presided at the performance of the high duty which these gentlemen were ordered to perform, and which they dared not to refuse to perform, under penalty of losing their commissions for disobedience of orders.

The result of that clamor was, that the last Congress organized, not another board of inquiry, but a series of courts of inquiry, which proceeded according to a different method, and which might, therefore, naturally be supposed likely to reach a different conclusion. The first board was an administrative board, and proceeded according to an administrative method—not concluding the case of any man by its judgment, but simply intended to advise the Administration, on their honor as gentlemen, and by their knowledge as officers, of what it was proper for the President to do in the premises. That board added no power to the President's existing authority. He already had the power, at his mere will and pleasure, to strike from the active list of the Navy any officer whom he saw fit. The only operation of that bill was to relieve the exercise of high executive discretion of its harshest features; to provide a salary for those who might thus be removed from the active list; to secure to meritorious men who, without their own fault, were no longer competent to perform their duties, an honorable retired pension, on which they might live respectably and comfortably the remainder of their lives, though no longer competent to discharge their duties as active officers.

That board proceeded in an administrative and not in a judicial method. It proceeded as the President proceeds when he makes appointments, and when he removes from office: not by summoning witnesses, not by the formalities of pleading, not with all the forms of judicial procedure, but upon the knowledge of the men who have to pass judgment, on that best of all knowledge—the knowledge of men of the profession, of the standing, the ability, the character, and the fitness of the men of their own profession.

The men composing this board were called by law to advise the President, and give him the knowledge which he could not otherwise have, in order that upon their advice, just as to-day on the advice and consent of the Senate, the President makes appointments without a judicial investigation of the facts. So here, on the advice of this board, who knew their brother officers, the President might remove from the active list those whom they might advise, and whom he, on his own knowledge and on their advice, should think were incompetent to discharge their high duties to their country.

That, sir, was the theory of that board in its original inception. That was the high purpose which it was intended to accomplish, and in my judgment, that was the purpose that it did, with perfect honesty and perfect uprightness, and with great efficiency accomplished. It accomplished it in the judgment of the Administration, for they confirmed the proceedings of the board, and removed from the active list all the officers whom the board recommended should be removed. That board removed no responsibility from the last Administration. The board afforded them the benefit of the experience of naval officers of high grade and low grade, and it was upon their advice that the Government acted, and not upon their judgment.

It is these proceedings which have called down upon the heads of the late naval board so much vituperation in Congress and out of it; when properly, if it belonged anywhere, it belonged to the Administration which sanctioned their proceedings—to the President, who removed from the active list; to the Secretary of the Navy, who advised to remove from the active list, men whom the board simply said ought to be removed.

There is no ground for the imputation of Star-Chamber proceedings on these gentlemen. They did what the law directed them to do. The law did not direct them to call witnesses; the law gave them no coercive process of law required in the examination of witnesses; the law required no record to be kept; it simply required, as has been required more than once in the history of the country before, when it was necessary to reduce the Army, and to reduce the Navy, that officers of high grade should advise the President, and that the President should act or not act upon their advice, as he should see fit.

The last Congress thought it was an unjust mode of procedure, and it passed a bill to remedy the evil. Whether it has remedied then or not, only the future can determine. I rather think that Administration will have a grave account to settle with the country which shall place over any American fleet, in time of war, any man whom these fifteen officers of the Navy, confirmed by the Cabinet and ratified by the President, have said was unfit to discharge the duties of active service. I rather think any Administration that shall commit the honor of the United States, the lives of her sailors, the safety of the country, and the protection of our commerce to any man who stands so condemned, will have a heavy responsibility to incur. It will require the spirit of a bold man to encounter the clamor that will be raised against that Administration under the auspices of which the flag of our country shall go down in dishonor upon the ocean under the charge of any man who was found deficient by that board. The last Congress has authorized the Administration to place itself in a position to encounter that responsibility. Sir, it was not by my vote.

But now we are called upon to go a step further. We have given an opportunity of restoring to the active list of the Navy, men whom fifteen of their peers, the President and his Administration, have said were unfit for active service; not by any means because of their individual personal characters; not by any means because they were dishonorable men; not because there was any taint upon them of any kind—without the assignment of a reason; some because of progress of age, some because of premature infirmity, some, it may be, for lack of official training, but in all cases without assigning a reason, leaving it in every case to the charitable inferences of the country to judge. But, sir, this House and the Senate have determined that that proceeding should not rest there, but that the men so removed should have an opportunity of being heard by their counsel, should be heard by evidence as to whether they were fit to command a ship in time of war or not. What was the result? Has the result of that inquiry justified the clamor on which the bill of the last Congress was passed?

The courts organized by the last act have not reinstated, I believe, one fourth of the men who were removed from the active list. Well, sir, if one will investigate the number of judgments in a court of appeals that are reversed, and compare that with the number of judgments passed by any lower tribunal, they will find that the courts of inquiry have not changed the findings of the naval board in anything like the proportion of instances in which a court of appeals reverses the judgments of the inferior courts. The one pursuing judicial methods has confirmed the other pursuing administrative methods in a greater proportion than ordinary courts of appeal confirm the judgments of inferior tribunals proceeding by the same method. I say that no results could come out more honorable to the gentlemen who formed that naval board than these results from the courts of inquiry. Then there is no ground for the imputation that it was a Star-Chamber proceeding; that unworthy motives actuated the gentlemen of the naval board, that men were stricken down without an opportunity of defense. It shows the eminent propriety of that mode of aiding the Administration by an administrative tribunal, with the free advice of gentlemen of high rank in their profession, to help them in the performance of an administrative act purging the Navy of material which, from one cause or another, was incompetent to discharge its duty.

What have the courts of inquiry done? They have shifted some of the officers who had been put upon the furlough list to the leave-of-absence list, and they have restored to the active list a small proportion only of those who were removed from it. The great mass of those who fell under the decision of the President, the Cabinet, and the board, rest where they were. They rest there either by their own judgment in not having sought a reversal of the decision of the naval board, or by the judgment of the courts of inquiry, which, on their application, have refused to restore them to the active list. The proposition now before this House is not only to disregard the judgment of the naval board, the Administration, and the former Cabinet, but likewise to disregard the judgment of those gentlemen upon themselves—to disregard the judgment of the courts of inquiry, and to refer again to the President to take out of these thrice condemned men who shall be placed again in high command in the Navy of the United States. I have not one word to say against the officers who have been so unfortunate as not to have obtained a favorable report from the courts of inquiry. There are many of them gentlemen of high position, high standing, and fair ability. They may be all of them men of the highest character, for aught I know; but we are not here, Mr. Speaker, dealing with matters which are to be decided by our private sympathies. We are now placing in the hands of the Administration a power to put men in high command who have been determined by two successive tribunals, organized in two different methods, or by their own judgment upon themselves, to be unfit for that command to which we are to restore them. I may have every confidence in the judgment and the wisdom of the Administration. I have some confidence likewise in my own judgment, and I have some respect for my own responsibility.

Mr. SEWARD. I will inquire of the gentleman from Maryland whether, in the absence of this legislation, the President, under the Constitution of the United States, has not the right to restore any or all of these men?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Why, then, the use of this legislation?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If he have that power, he will do it without a vote of the House of Representatives sanctioning it.

Mr. SEWARD. That is not answering my question. Does not the President possess that power?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I cannot answer that question, because I have not examined the law minutely. It is possible that he may have the power. My impression is that he has not the power. He can appoint anybody that he chooses as an original appointment, but he cannot reinstate these men in their original rank without, I presume, affirmative legislation on the part of Congress, unless they go through the formality of an appointment de novo.

Mr. SEWARD. Of course.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is not at all likely that any President is going to take men, who stand thus condemned, and appoint them to their respective grades and to their former rank, unless he shall have the sanction of both Houses of Congress for violating the ordinary rules of appointment. So, whatever the law may be, it still comes, Mr. Speaker, to this: that they will rest where they are unless we incite the Administration by authorizing the President to do it, unless we give the Administration our opinion that it is a thing which it may be right to do. And for my single self, whatever confidence and respect I may have for the Administration, I will not remove any obstacle against the reinstatement of gentlemen who have been found incompetent for the discharge of their duties by a succession of inquiries, such as they have been submitted to. I am unwilling to take my share of the small, remote, contingent responsibility of having hereafter, when some great naval disaster shall have befallen us, and some great dishonor shall have marked the American name, any man point to my vote here and say, "you, sir, authorized the Administration to place that man in high command, who has now brought down death and destruction upon your fellow-citizens and a stain upon the hitherto untarnished honor of the American name." If other gentlemen are willing to act to that extent, be the responsibility theirs.

I only desire, in these few words, to enter my protest against the proceeding; to show wherein injustice has been done to as honorable a body of men as ever met under any order of the naval service; and to show how completely the findings of the courts of inquiry, under a different form of process, has been to confirm the general propriety of their proceedings; and also, to enter my protest against this dangerous precedent of allowing the President to restore men that three several courts of investigation have pronounced to be incompetent to discharge their duties.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favor of the resolution which is pending before this House. In common with the whole country, I have watched the proceedings of the courts of inquiry with deep interest, and a close and exacting scrutiny. I have not felt prepared, as, perhaps, few of us have, to pronounce upon every case that came before these courts; but I have felt prepared, I feel prepared now, to show that the findings of these courts are in some instances absolutely repugnant to every sense of justice and fair dealing. But I will say in advance that I utterly repudiate any intention or disposition to reflect upon the character of either of these naval courts of inquiry. I have no doubt, sir, that they were composed of high-minded, honorable gentlemen, and most efficient officers. For the president of the first board I have the deepest and strongest personal regard. I am proud of him, sir, as a citizen of my own State, and, in some sense, one of my immediate constituents. Without any special knowledge of the character of the individuals composing the board generally, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe they were actuated by pure, patriotic, and conscientious motives. But, sir, "to err is human." No court can be so constituted that its judgment shall be infallible. And to say that any tribunal is to pronounce definitively upon that which is to stamp the character of a man, to fix a blot upon the reputation of an officer in a distinguished arm of the public service, is to assign it more power than I am willing to grant to any court, however composed or constituted. Sir, the meanest criminal who receives the sentence of a judge, may yet look to executive clemency; may yet look to the pardoning power which all constitutions and the laws of all civilized nations have vested somewhere, if not for justice, at least, that it shall be tempered with mercy, if the particular case calls for mercy.

But, sir, where is the mercy that these boards have shown? I will not go into particulars, for there would be no propriety, at this time and in this place, in doing so; but I know, and other gentlemen around me know, of cases in which men have been stricken from the roll of honorable service without, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] has well said, any taint, any imputation upon their character, but where they have been left to go down to the grave with the gnawing consciousness that the finger of scorn is pointed at them, and that they cannot stand out in the light of God's day either to disprove or to have proof of the charges against them.

Sir, is not this true? Is it not known to many honorable gentlemen upon this floor? The gentleman from Maryland spoke feelingly about the delicate task of committing the honor of the American flag to the hands of those who have been pronounced by their brother officers incompetent and unworthy to uphold it. Sir, does the history of our Navy, does the history of our Army, show that on any field either branch of the service has ever been found wanting? Show me the record that goes to prove that our Navy has ever been found unequal to grapple with any foe.

I have now in my mind's eye a distinguished officer whom the action of this board has removed from his proper rank and position, who won laurels, great and lasting, only a very short time before the board pronounced upon his case, an officer, who, for his gallantry—and that not simply gallantry displayed against a national enemy, but gallantry displayed in defense of humanity, gallantry shown in fighting against a common foe of humanity—who, for his brave deed in sweeping from the waters a horde of pirates, ten times more numerous than his own force, has received the thanks of three of the great Powers of the world, and has had the highest honors that they could offer tendered to him. And yet, sir, he was removed from the Navy, which he had adorned: and for what? We cannot learn from the first board for what cause any one removal took place; for they met here in secret conclave, with no stenographer to take down the proceedings, with no journal in which they were to be preserved; but without record, and without note or comment, they came to their conclusions. But when the second board, giving up something to the public sentiment and to public opinion, and in accordance with the recognized feeling of the civilized world in favor of fair play, just dealing, and an open trial, arrayed the facts and the witnesses before us, what do we find was the black record which was to wipe out the brilliant services of that officer? That, upon two occasions, he yielded to over-indulgence, and was overcome by wine! Sir, I, perhaps, might be considered by many, in this age of temperance societies, and other isms, lax in my notions. I know not. I hope I have as proper a horror as any one of the bestiality which would degrade a man from his noble prerogatives as a rational being, and approximate him to the brute; still less would I overlook it in one in high office, occupying a responsible and honorable position; but, sir, I would be the last to say here openly to the world that I would deprive a gallant soldier or sailor of his position and of his bread, or what is far dearer than these, his honor, because he may have indulged in an occasional weakness. It is too unjust, too harsh, to be justified gravely by reasonable men.

Now, sir, what does this resolution propose? It simply proposes to vest in the President that executive clemency which, as I said before, the meanest malefactor under all laws is entitled to hope for. It does not propose to instruct the President; it does not propose to hamper or embarrass him in any way. It is simply to enable him to do an act of justice; or it may perchance be, in some particular cases, an act of mercy. Are we prepared, gentlemen, to say that our Navy is in so rotten a condition, so unsound to the core, that an operation so terrible as this must be performed—that we are to lop off, limb after limb, even those that have given strong and sturdy and hearty blows for the honor of the country? Are we prepared to say that it is in such a condition that this is its only hope of cure, its only chance of salvation? I, for one, am not prepared to say it. Without any professional or technical knowledge of the Navy, I, as an American citizen, feel too proud of our Navy, too well assured that it will on every occasion be found equal to any emergency, to believe that it is necessary to resort to measures so extreme, and working, as I believe, in many cases, such individual injustice. No, sir; though our Navy may have inefficient officers, though it may have men who have grown gray and decrepit in the service, and who are entitled to be put gently aside without reproach; though there may be, moreover, men in it who have faults and vices which in some degree may impair their individual efficiency, I still believe that it is composed of men as brave and as good seamen, as intelligent and patriotic, as the navy of any country upon the face of the earth.

I do not believe that it is necessary to its efficiency to resort to a method which has not been found necessary before in any civilized country. I believe the true method of purging the Navy, and of rendering it absolutely efficient, is that those who have the guidance and direction of it should give it such duties to perform, should use its discretion so as to sift it and show up those officers who were unequal to their work, and those who were equal to it. The deficiencies and shortcomings of officers would be thus exhibited before the country, and it would be published to the world that, for such and such reasons, these men were punished. But let us not strike in the dark. I cannot agree with the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.] His notions and mine differ very materially on that particular point. I cannot believe in secret associations or secret bodies, that may use the weapon of destruction without the one assailed knowing exactly from what quarter the assault comes. I believe that everything that the public good demands can be done by freemen, openly and manfully, in the face of day, and without the necessity of any concealment.

With regard to the particular point, whether authority to replace these officers is vested in the President, I would say that, so far as I could learn, it is not considered merely a doubtful point. As I understand, the conclusion that has been come to, after deliberate consultation and thorough investigation, is, that he has not the power. Hence this resolution is not supererogatory. It is one that is absolutely called for. Believing that this action ought to be taken, that the resolution is a just one, and an absolutely necessary one, I shall support it with all my heart.

Mr. CHAPMAN. The honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] has passed a high panegyric on the members of the board. Against these gentlemen, personally, I have nothing to say. They may be all honorable men and gallant officers. I will not charge them, as they have been charged in other places, with having, previously to their organization, engaged in a conspiracy to strike from the roll officers whose distinguished merit they envied. I will not charge them with corruption; but I will say that they were surrounded by influences of the most dangerous character, utterly at war with everything like fair dealing; and if their action were allowed to operate, it would result in nothing else than wrong. There was not a man among them against whom a cause of challenge did not exist, sufficient to force from the panel any juror in any court in the country.

In the first place, they constituted a tribunal which decided the cases of its own members; and, although under the regulation prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, an officer did not sit precisely on his own case, still, by sections, they determined the cases of one another. And, besides, they were directly and immediately interested in the decisions that they gave, for whatever vacancy was created by disrating a senior officer, was filled from among those who were left. When Captains Stewart, Read, Zantinger, Ramsay, and others, were disrated, those who were left were advanced. Consequently these judges were benefited by every vacancy that was created. They must have been more than human to have been above and beyond the reach of the temptation to do wrong. There is not a judge in the country who would for a moment occupy his place on the bench if he discovers that he has an interest in the event of the suit. He will either retire from it, or will change the venue. And there is not a juror that will be allowed for a moment to sit in the box if it be discovered that he has an interest in the event of the suit.

But, aside from the objections that might be urged against the constitution of that tribunal, there are objections of still more force to be raised against the manner in which the trials were conducted. In no country, save where the darkest despotism has extinguished every impulse of generous men, can a parallel be found for it. When and where, before, has a man been tried without a summons, without a hearing, and even without the chance of being heard, and with the cause of his condemnation forever smothered? And when we remember that there were some seven hundred cases to be investigated by that board, and that but six weeks were occupied in the investigation; and when we find, making even a liberal allowance for working hours each day, that but a few minutes could have been appropriated to each case, we need not wonder at the havoc that has been made.

But, sir, the great and overwhelming condemnation of the action of the board has been since recorded. Out of one hundred and eight decisions of that naval board, sixty-two have been reversed—reversed, too, by the naval courts organized under the act of 1857. Here is a long list of gallant men—men of honor, who feel the stain upon their reputations, who have been stigmatized and impoverished, who feel like outcasts from the Navy and outcasts from society. Many of them have families, who share deeply in their deprivation and humiliation. They are men dishonored, condemned, without a hearing; and this is in a republican land! This is a commentary which will forever rest upon this dark deed, illustrating its iniquity.

I listened to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCK,] chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the other day, and I believe I understood him to say that those officers who had not applied for an investigation before the naval courts, are presumed to have approved the action of the naval retiring board. In this I beg to differ with the honorable gentleman.

Mr. BOGOCK. I did not say exactly that.

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is the position I understood the honorable gentleman to take, and I differ with him entirely in it. I believe that these officers were actuated by far other considerations. If there be any one of them who approves the action of that board, I can only account for it upon the supposition that the blow has dethroned his reason; for, however degraded he might esteem himself, and however just he might consider his expulsion from the Navy under other circumstances, he never, as a sane man, could approve the merciless, the inquisitorial process, by which himself and two hundred others were condemned to poverty and disgrace.

Sir, out of the more than two hundred officers who then fell under the ban of proscription, there is not one of them who can tell the cause of his expulsion. There was no trial; there were no charges; there were no specifications; there was no record; there was nothing save the simple decree of condemnation, that fell upon him like the blow of the midnight assassin. It came to some while they were far from home, upon distant seas, sedulously engaged in the service of the country, maintaining the honor of its flag. It came to others unlooked for, turning into bitterness the peace and happiness of a household as with a curse. Who can tell for what offense Commodore Stewart was stricken from his high place in the Navy? Was it for decrepitude? Was it for mental infirmity? Was it for some great crime, for which he ought to suffer incarceration in the penitentiary? Can these fifteen executioners answer the question? They have sealed their lips by a self-imposed obligation of secrecy. They dare not tell. And I believe it was the only obligation they took upon themselves. Yet here is a man, whose name is associated with the most brilliant deeds of the American Navy and heroic achievements recorded in the brightest pages of our naval history, whose whole life has been devoted, and successfully devoted, to the service of his country, securing a world-wide fame and universal respect, surrounded with mystery. No man can tell for what that officer was stricken from the roll. It was his fortune, however, in early life, to have achieved for himself and his country imperishable renown; and he has so filled up the interval since, that not a leaf has withered on his brow, not a blot has fallen upon his good name.

It is not so with the younger members of the service—men who came upon the stage of action long after opportunities presented themselves to enroll their names upon the scroll of fame. They have yet the battle of life to fight. Who can tell me for what this officer was dropped; or for what that officer was retired? Was it for drunkenness? Was it for insubordination? Was it for any of the infamous vices that degrade society? Who can tell? No man on earth, except the fifteen members of that board, and they dare not tell. I have heard it said that it was a matter of forbearance upon the part of this board, that it was a mercy these disclosures were not made. Was it merciful to Commodore Stewart? Was it forbearance to him, that he—a man of his distinction and his service—should have been thrown pell-mell into a crowd of men who are charged with the vilest crimes, with all that is infamous? Was that just? was that fair? was that humane? They throw him into such company and leave him there. And why leave these companions of his in the predicament in which they have been placed? No one can remove the charge. Every mouth is stopped and every tongue is silent except that of slander, and it may utter anything. Let me say that this man was dropped for larceny, that that man was dropped for piracy, or for some atrocious offense; for cheating or something of an infamous character, and who can contradict it? The only tongue that moves is that of slander, and it may block the way of every one of them to any success in civil life. There they stand with mystery around them, the objects alone of slander.

Now, sir, I beg to say that the gentleman from Virginia is in error when he supposes that any of these officers approved the proceedings of this board. There were other reasons which operated upon their minds. The veterans of the service would not humiliate themselves by seeking an investigation into their moral, mental, physical, and professional fitness before courts, the officers constituting which were but recently sweeping the decks about their heels. There were others who were crushed and broken down in spirit, brought to the earth, who had not confidence enough in themselves, much less in the courts, to seek an investigation. And there were others so far impoverished that they did not possess the pecuniary means to defray the expenses of a trial without encroaching upon the comforts of their families. These are the reasons, I apprehend, which influenced the officers who did not apply for an investigation by the naval courts so recently dissolved.

The resolution under consideration I understand to propose that the President shall have power to examine the record in each case where unfavorable reports have been made by the naval courts of inquiry; and on such investigation, if he is satisfied that injustice has been done, to reverse the decision of such courts, or to nominate for restoration the officers against whom such reports have been made. It is a misfortune that the act of 1857 did not confer upon the President the authority that is now contemplated; and it seems to me somewhat strange that that authority was not then conferred, because it does appear to me that the President is just as competent to decide that an adverse report is erroneous, as to decide that a favorable report is erroneous. It seems to me that it would have been but reasonable to have given him the power at the time to determine in either case. It is just as likely that these naval courts would err where they have rendered adverse reports, as where they have rendered favorable reports; and especially considering the position they occupy towards these officers. For, Mr. Speaker, I say that the several judges of these naval courts were surrounded by precisely the same influence which surrounded the members of the naval retiring board. Whenever an officer who had been dropped or disgraced came before them, if he were a senior officer, they necessarily felt an interest, or at least they were in the way of temptation. I will not charge them with corruption. I will not say they were biased by any consideration of the kind. I have no doubt that they are honorable men and gallant officers. But that they occupied such a position as this is beyond dispute; and I ask whether it can be conceived that it was safe to trust the fortunes and destiny of gallant men to tribunals who were surrounded by such influences?

The first court that was organized under the act of 1857, was convened shortly before the close of the last Administration. It is most unfortunate, I think, that the Secretary of the Navy deemed it his duty to make his selection from the Navy altogether. I have examined that act, and I am not able to discover that such a duty devolved upon him. I believe it was competent for him to have selected partly from the Army, partly from the Navy, and partly from civil life; and if he had done so, some of the objections raised against these tribunals would not have existed. But he thought proper to take a different course. I do not say anything in condemnation of him. Perhaps I err in judgment, in my construction of the act. He may have erred in his construction of it.

It was thought proper on his part to call for the advice and counsel of the Attorney General, and the Attorney General did perfectly right when he gave his instructions to the Secretary of the Navy in regard to his own duties. But when the Attorney General chose to instruct the judges of the courts as to the manner in which they should conduct these trials, as to their duties, as to the rules of evidence, and as to what should constitute evidence proper for condemnation, then he encroached upon their prerogative; then he marked out a line for them to pursue which resulted unfortunately for those officers who made the application for an investigation. He says in that letter of instructions, that the officer who applies to these courts for investigation into his moral, mental, physical, and professional fitness is to be considered the actor and not as a defendant against whom the Department makes a charge. In that, of course, he was perfectly correct. But when he proceeds to say that after the officer has laid all of his testimony in regard to these particulars before the court, the Department may turn round and assail him with almost every description of evidence; may assail him in regard to every period of his professional life without latitude, without limit, and when he says that they may go into the region of opinion to defeat an officer's restoration, then I say that he was encroaching upon the prerogative of these courts, and then he was marking out a line of duty to be performed by the judges which was fatal in many instances to these officers.

It appears to me that the same objections which were urged against the naval retiring board may be urged against these courts. An impression was made upon them by the example which was set on the score of secrecy from which they could not depart. In the first place, the reporters for the press—the gentlemen who are admitted into this Hall freely, who are admitted into every court in this country—were utterly excluded, and the decisions to which the courts arrived were sealed up, and many months of mental torment were added to the sufferings of these officers before the seals were broken. I see no reason why, after the report was made favorable to an officer, he should not have known his fate at once; and yet that harrowing suspense, notwithstanding the favorable report, was continued from that time up to the meeting of Congress. And more than that: an officer who was to be the actor, who was to be the applicant to these courts for investigation, was required by the judge-advocate, if he desired to subpoena witnesses, to present the names of those witnesses to him, and not only to present their names, but he was required to state what it was designed to prove by them. And yet, while the officer was disclosing these facts, disclosing what he expected to prove by this witness and by that witness, he had not the advantage of the Department or of the Government; because, when he came before the court and the investigation was entered into, while the Department was acquainted with all his testimony and with what he expected to prove, the officer was entirely at the mercy of the judge-advocate; he did not know at what moment in the progress of the trial something might be sprung upon him which he would be entirely unable to disprove; some trivial circumstance which he himself had utterly forgotten, but which might be explained if he had witnesses here that were upon the distant sea. There were many instances of this kind, where officers were taken by surprise, and had not witnesses here for the purpose of disproving charges made against them. Thus an immense advantage was given to the Department over the officer. He was unable to anticipate what would be brought against him.

It seems to me, sir, that instead of making these courts simply courts of inquiry, and the judge-advocate an officer to record the testimony which should be adduced before them, it was designed to convert them into great Crown criminal courts, and the judge-advocate into a prosecuting attorney, and, as was said by the gentleman from South Carolina, the poor officer was placed in the position of a felon in the dock.

Mr. Speaker, I have said nothing against the integrity of the officers who composed these courts—nothing against their honor. I do not mean to do so. I have spoken of the circumstances by which they were surrounded, and the temptations which were in their way to do wrong. The witnesses who were called on the part of the Government, in many instances, came there with all the prejudices and all the passions that the bickerings, disputes, and rivalries that exist in the Navy could generate. Whether they subdued and smothered them I cannot say. Considering the fallibility of human nature, although I will not charge them with having been influenced by those considerations, it is impossible for me to say that in all instances they were not influenced by them. They had a direct interest in defeating the restoration of every senior officer. I do not say that they were influenced by it; but that was their position—that was the predicament in which they were placed. The fleet was scoured, the bureaus were scoured, the docks were scoured, for the purpose of bringing forward witnesses, in order to defeat the success of applicants for reinstatement.

Well, sir, under all these circumstances, what are we to say? That there have been fair trials, and that justice has been done in all instances? For my part, I am not prepared to say so. Gentlemen need not be apprehensive that, under the operation of this resolution, the Navy will be unnecessarily increased beyond the limits provided by the act of 1842. We are all aware that vacancies are constantly occurring by death or resignation. And besides that, it would take the President necessarily some time to investigate those cases in which unfavorable reports have been rendered. It would necessarily take the Senate some time to make the investigation. It has been alleged here to-day by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] I believe, that the President has no power to restore officers against whom unfavorable reports have been rendered. Well, sir, if that be the case, are we to say that we have among us a set of unfortunate men, who are outlawed? who do not stand on the same footing and on the same platform as their fellow-citizens? Are they beyond the reach of executive clemency? Are they beyond the reach of mercy? If they are, then the sooner they leave this country the better. The object of this resolution is to put these men on the same footing with their fellow-citizens. The President has the power to take any man now engaged in the civil service and place him in the front rank in the Navy. Why not, then, give him the power to call these men back into the service? If he has the one power, he ought to have the other, or else we have different classes of men among us. And these men have not only been disgraced; they have not only lost their swords, but they have lost their rights as citizens.

I do not contend, sir, that an officer of the Navy has a fee-simple in his commission—no such thing. I admit that the President may strike from the roll of the Navy any man he chooses, without assigning any cause for it. He may strike from the roll Commodore Shubrick, without assigning any cause. But let it be remembered that many of these men went into the service when they were but boys; that the naval profession is the business of their lives; that they have been stricken down in middle life, and are now turned ashore to seek for civil employment, with a brand upon them which will prevent them from succeeding. I ask whether this country is not now under a moral obligation to give these officers a fair chance, and under a moral obligation to sustain every man in the Navy in his place, unless sufficient cause is assigned why he should lose it?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if I were to consult my own feelings, I should vote for this resolution. Several gentlemen, who are friends and acquaintances of mine, have been affected by the action of the naval board; and, therefore, if I were to be guided by my feelings, I should at once give those officers another chance to save their positions. But, sir, I am satisfied, from the examination I have made of this question, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that this resolution ought not to pass. There is no good reason why it should pass. These officers have already had the benefit of two trials. The first trial was before the naval board, where they had no opportunity to examine witnesses; where they were not able to confront their accusers; where they had had none of those safeguards which the law wisely secures to every citizen, and therefore I would give to the action of the first naval board no weight whatever. So far I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MILES.] A tribunal organized like the first naval board, however pure may be the character of its members, and however great and glorious their achievements, should not finally affect the rights or impair the position of any officer; but their action may justly be regarded in the light of an accusation or indictment, to be subsequently tried by a tribunal fairly organized. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not base my action at all on what was done by the naval board of fifteen. I think that too much weight has been given to its action by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] and that such action ought not to have affected the condition of any member of the Navy. The life, the conduct, the services, of seven hundred and odd officers of the Navy were brought before that board, and it was physically impossible that it should give to each a full and impartial hearing; but it might properly, and it did, report that two hundred officers should be either retired from the Navy or placed on leave-of-absence pay, or furlough pay.

Mr. PENDLETON. My colleague says that the characters of seven hundred officers were examined by that board.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENDLETON. How long was that board in session?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It was not in session a sufficient time to give these men a fair trial.

Mr. PENDLETON. Was it not in session from the 20th of June to the 26th of July only?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Perhaps the gentleman is correct. I say that I do not place any reliance on the action of the first naval board, although that board was constituted of the most distinguished officers of the Navy—of men who were placed beyond the reach of accusation themselves. I look upon it as simply a board of inquiry to present such officers of the Navy as they deemed unfit for active service. Therefore, my vote will not depend on the action of the naval board. But gentlemen seem to have forgotten the act of the last Congress, and subsequent proceedings under it. These officers came before the last Congress with their complaints. They charged that they had been hardly dealt by; that they had not been confronted with the witnesses against them; that they had had none of the elements of a fair and just trial. Their complaints were recognized as just. Congress, after mature deliberation, passed the law which I hold in my hand. This act provided that, if any of the officers affected by the naval board had any cause of complaint in regard to the action of the board, they should have leave to have their physical, mental, professional, and moral fitness inquired into by a naval court, to be organized and governed by the laws and regulations which govern courts of inquiry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when every one of these officers had a fair trial secured to him by law, and had an opportunity to go before a court fairly organized and fairly constituted, he, as an officer of the Navy, should be willing to abide by the judgment of his peers.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Can the gentleman from Ohio tell me who pays the expenses of the officer demanding inquiry under that law? Does he himself pay the expenses of witnesses, as well as of counsel, or does the Government pay the expenses of the proceedings?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am not able to give the gentleman the information he seeks, as to the expenses; but I have examined the law, and I find that it provides for each one of these officers a fair and just mode of trial, according to the rules and regulations of the Navy; and these, I presume, are, in the main, similar to the ordinary rules of civil courts.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I will suggest, for the information of my colleague, that all witnesses before naval courts-martial are summoned by the judge-advocate, and their expenses are paid by the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then, Mr. Speaker, this law of the 16th of July, 1857, treats the action of the first court as an indictment, as an accusation made against an officer, that he was either physically, mentally, professionally, or morally, unfit for his position. So regarding it, the law gave to each one of these officers an opportunity to have a fair, just, and impartial trial. If any citizen is accused of murder, he could have no more impartial trial than was extended by this law. A grand jury of fifteen find against him an indictment; so this first naval board found against these officers an accusation that each of them was either mentally, morally, physically, or professionally unfit to perform active service as an officer of the Navy. This accusation is referred to a naval court, composed of the peers of the accused. If any one pleads not guilty; if any one says that the accusation is not true; if he says that he has not had a fair trial; this law secures the benefit of such a trial by his fellow-officers. It secures him the benefit of witnesses, of an open accusation, and a fair hearing. What more can be asked?

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman from Ohio attempts to analogize the case with proceedings before a grand jury. I ask him if there was a witness sworn before this grand jury of fifteen? And then I propose to ask him, if witnesses were sworn, what are the charges, and where is the issue on which these parties were tried before the courts of inquiry? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman from Georgia studiously evades my point. I say again that I do not place any stress on the action of the first board, except as an allegation, or accusation, or indictment.

But I insist that every one of these officers had a fair trial secured to him before the second court. He had power there to call witnesses, to have these witnesses sworn and examined in his presence, and to cross-examine them. Every witness examined before this second board was examined in the presence of the accused officer; and he therefore has no ground of complaint.

Any officer of the Navy, or any officer of the Army, or any officer of this House, or of the Government, ought to be willing at all times to abide by the judgment of his peers, when that judgment is guarded by all the constitutional rights secured to other citizens. Therefore, if I am accused before this House of being mentally, morally, or physically unfit to hold a seat here, I will not demand a second trial if a majority of my peers say that that accusation is true. So, sir, with officers of the Navy. If a fair court of inquiry say of an officer that he is morally, mentally, or physically unfit to hold his position, it would be improper for him to attempt to thrust himself into a service, to perform the duties of which his associates and peers have, on full examination, pronounced him unfit.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Had these naval courts of inquiry the power of revising and setting aside the action of the first court?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Undoubtedly, under the law of 16th January, 1857, to which I have adverted, every one of these officers whose cases are now pressed upon us had a right to demand a fair and just trial; and if it resulted in his favor, the law restored him to his full rank and pay. If gentlemen here can show me why these officers have not had the trial provided by law, I will be willing to give them a second, third, fourth, or tenth trial.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I desire to suggest that there are two classes of cases in which, under the remedial process of this law, officers have not been able to have the fair trial that the gentleman from Ohio speaks of. One of these classes is composed of cases in which the witnesses of the parties have been without the process of the court at the time the inquiry was held. Some of these witnesses were drowned at sea, and others absent on service at foreign stations; and there are other cases where, as I know, the parties were unable to avail themselves of the provisions of the law because of the cost of the proceedings.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The cases referred to have been provided for. The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the other day a resolution which gives to every officer who, by reason of any circumstances, could not avail himself of the benefit of the law of the last Congress, one year within which to avail himself of the benefits of that law. So that, if there are any exceptional cases of men who could not avail themselves of those benefits, Congress has already given those officers an opportunity of a fair trial at a future time. So the gentleman from Maryland will see that my proposition stands good, that not a single one of the two hundred officers affected by the action of the naval board but will have had a full, fair, and adequate trial by the judgment of his peers; and, therefore, these officers do not stand in a favorable attitude when they desire to push themselves into the active list of the Navy, when their brother officers, who have served with them afloat and ashore, have pronounced them physically, mentally, and professionally unfit for active service. I want that the same rule should be applied to them that is applied to other citizens. I am so much accustomed to obey and respect the decisions of the courts, and the rules which guide those decisions, that I do not see any reason why an officer of the Navy should have advantages and opportunities of defense which are denied to every other citizen charged with the highest crimes known to our law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are more than two hundred cases which have been acted on by the first naval court. One hundred of them—I speak in round numbers—have never complained of the action of the first naval court. That, in my mind, is conclusive that so many, at least, had no cause of complaint, and never had any wish to have their cases examined or investigated. They may be regarded as having plead guilty to the charges of the first naval court.

About one hundred others demanded a trial under the provisions of the law of the last Congress, and the second court sustained the charges of the first in nearly all the cases. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHAPMAN] said that the decision of the first court was reversed in sixty cases. In this, the gentleman is mistaken. There are four lists provided for by this law. One is the retired list, where the officer leaves the service with one year's pay. Another called the leave-pay list. Another is the furlough list. Now, this second court of inquiry changed the position of some of those officers from one class to another. Some on the retired list were changed on to the leave-pay list, and others on the leave-pay list were transferred to the furlough list. Many changes of this kind were made, but there were very few cases in which the decision of the first board was entirely reversed; and that, in my judgment, shows that the action of the first board was not as unjust as was supposed during the last Congress. But, sir, whatever may be said as to the action of that board, the second trial has not been impeached, and these officers stand before the House demanding a third trial.

The first board brought the accusation. The second one was a court of trial, before which witnesses were examined, and the whole examination reduced in writing. Now, these officers are still unsatisfied, and demand a third trial before the President and Senate of the United States. I think there is no good reason in law or in equity why this trial should be granted. Suppose we pass this resolution: you throw upon the President an enormous labor. You convert him into a court of errors; you would have to give to him a new lease of life. The President has not the physical power to examine the evidence in all these cases. I have heard it said that the President, if you pass this law, intends to devolve this labor upon the Senate. I do not know whether this is true or not, and I do not care. It is certain that if you pass this law you devolve upon the President a labor which it is impossible for him to perform. He will throw the burden and the responsibility of the trial upon the Senate of the United States; and we all know what kind of a body this House or the Senate is to act as a court of errors, to review the decision of a naval, or any other court. In the State of New York they once undertook to make their upper House or Senate act as a court of errors; but that has long since been abolished.

It may be that injustice has been done in some cases. That I know nothing about, and I am not here to determine it; and I will not constitute myself a judge to determine whether the naval court acted right or wrong in particular, for I am unfit for such an inquiry. A naval court is the proper tribunal for such a trial, and no reason is shown why substantial justice has not been done.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not see the propriety of entering upon any discussion of the merits, or the demerits, of the old naval board; but, sir, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] has undertaken it. To defend the judgments of that board is indeed a labor and a task; but the gentleman from Maryland has ventured upon it. But his defense has been made after trial and condemnation. The proceedings of that board have been condemned by the voice of the public press, by the general sentiment of the American people, by resolutions of State Legislatures, by the solemn judgment of the Congress of the United States, and by the deliberate, though unconscious, testimony of these courts of inquiry themselves.

Congress, in passing the law organizing these courts, and in subjecting the decisions of the naval board to their revision, acknowledged the errors which existed, and intended to provide a means for correcting them; and these courts, in reversing the judgment of the naval board in a majority of the cases brought before them, have given the strongest testimony to the rashness, haste, and inconsideration which marked the proceedings of that board. Sir, I did not vote for the law of the last session of Congress. I felt so much indignation at the proceedings of the naval board as to be prompted to introduce into this House a bill for the purpose of reversing all of their proceedings, and annulling all of their judgments. I would have restored to the active list all officers of the Navy who had been injuriously affected by it. No opportunity was offered for invoking the opinion of the House on the propriety of passing such a law; and it was only when these officers, impatient of the long delay, believed there was no hope of securing the justice which they so ardently desired, that they urged members here to vote for the bill of the last session—a bill which I then regarded, and still regard, as an unfortunate one for them. I was unwilling to send these officers again to be examined before those whose interests strongly prompted them to look unfavorably upon their applications. I did not think worse of, nor had I less confidence in, those men, than I had in all other men in like circumstances; but, sir, I knew that human nature was too weak to resist the temptations to which they would be exposed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHAPMAN] referred to a remark made some time since by another gentleman in debate, in which he assumed that those who did not make their appearance before these courts acknowledged the justice of the proceedings against them. I know many of these officers well; and I can assure the House that they were animated by far different motives and sentiments. They felt it to be a sort of humiliation that they should be compelled to appear before these courts for the purpose of establishing their professional, physical, mental, and moral fitness for the naval service.

Now, what is it that is asked? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says that these men have had two fair trials before their peers, and that they now ask another. I tell the gentleman that these officers have never had one trial. I repeat with emphasis, that they have never had one. Do you call the deliberation of the conclave of fifteen, acting in secret, without witnesses, without notice to the accused, without even an accusation, without opportunity for defense—do you call that a trial?

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] said that the proceedings of that board were subject to the revision of the Executive; and he stated that the President and his Cabinet had deliberately approved their judgments. Has the gentleman from Maryland forgotten that so far from the proceedings of the board having ever been confirmed or sanctioned by the deliberate judgment of the President or the Navy Department, the late Secretary of the Navy, in an official report—I think it was an official report to Congress—admits that he urged the President to confirm all the proceedings and findings of that board, upon the ground that it was to the board, and not to the President or the Secretary, Congress committed the delicate task of examining into the fitness of officers of the Navy, for the positions they occupied? The Secretary admitted that there were some of the judgments of the board in which he did not concur; but he urged the President to confirm them without examination. It has never been denied that they were confirmed without examination. Then there was no trial before the original board of fifteen.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] asks whether they had not full opportunity for defense and vindication before the courts of inquiry? He wants to know whether that was not a trial? The gentleman from Ohio, who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, ought to know that from the foundation of the Government to the present time, no officer of the Army or the Navy has been tried by those he calls his peers. No officer of the Navy or Army can be tried except by the President of the United States. It is the President who, in confirming or annulling the sentence of the court, determines upon the character of the proceedings. What, then, does this resolution ask? Simply that these officers shall be placed upon the footing on which officers of the Army and Navy have heretofore stood, from the beginning of the Government to the present day; that they shall not be cut off from the opportunity of having the proceedings of the court revised by the Executive; and that in these cases, as in all others, the President shall have the power to determine as to the fairness and correctness of the proceedings of the court. Can the gentleman assign a reason why a different course should be pursued in the present case, from that adopted in other cases? Why is it that these officers should be left to the uncontrolled judgment of their brother officers, some of whom may be their juniors, and who may have, in that regard, a strong interest to sustain the decisions of the board, while all other officers of the Navy are entitled, by law, to maintain their positions in the service until they are driven from it in disgrace by the judgment of the President? Why, sir, it was a defect in the law, and perhaps an unintentional one, that all the decisions of the board were not subject to the revision of the President. I did not vote for the law; but I took it for granted that this provision was there. I took it for granted that the President was to revise all the decisions of the courts of inquiry; not only those favorable to the applicants, but those adverse to them. Can any reason be assigned for the distinction?

Now, sir, this resolution does not ask that anything unusual shall be done. It only asks that the uniform practice of the Government shall be adhered to in these cases, and that these officers of the Navy, first aggrieved by dismissal from the active service of the country by the secret judgment of the board of fifteen, shall now, at least, have an opportunity of laying their cases before the President, upon the records taken by the courts themselves. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] laid much stress upon the fact that President Pierce had had an opportunity of approving the judgments of the first board, and had actually availed himself of that opportunity; and yet, with strange inconsistency, he objects to giving President Buchanan the opportunity of revising the proceedings of the courts of inquiry. If there was anything of force in the argument of the gentleman from Maryland—and there would have been much force in it, if the fact were as he states it—then, sir, the gentleman will find it difficult to explain why the very same privilege should not be afforded to the officers who are to be affected by the joint resolution which we are now considering of presenting their cases to the President.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] objects that this resolution, if passed, will make the Senate a court of appeals. And when, sir, has the Senate been any other than a court of appeals, in respect to all the nominations of the President? Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that the appointing power, under our Constitution, does not rest with the President? Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that the President of the United States has no further right than to nominate an officer for appointment, and that it is the Senate that makes the appointment? When has the Senate been aught else than a court of appeals on the nominations of the President? Why, sir, they have exercised the functions of a court of appeals, in considering the nominations lately made to them, and founded upon the judgments and recommendations of these very courts of inquiry.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he can tell me of any case in the history of our Government, where the Senate has been called upon to review the decision of a court, and the grounds on which the decision was made?

Mr. MILLSON. Yes, sir; many such cases. The gentleman need not go further back than to the records of the Senate for the last session to assure himself that upon a nomination made, on a dismissal from the Army of an officer by the sentence of a general court-martial, all those proceedings were brought under review; and that the Senate then acted with reference to their disapproval of those proceedings. Sir, I marvel at the gentleman's inquiry. How is it possible to divest the Senate of this prerogative—to deny them the privilege of considering all the reasons that may apply to any case where an officer is nominated for appointment to any situation? It is incident to them, as the council of the President, making appointments to office.

I say, then, that the simple object of this joint resolution is to give to the President, in these cases, the right which he has exercised in every other case, from the earliest period in our political history to the present time. I repeat that no officer of the Army or Navy has ever been tried by his peers; and there are just reasons for it. I do not mean to speak disparagingly of the officers of the Army or Navy; but I have had some experience of the mode in which they discharge their judicial duties. It has been my fortune to appear in a professional capacity before naval courts-martial, quite as frequently, perhaps, as any other gentleman in my neighborhood; and, from that experience, I say, without intending disparagement to those gentlemen, that their occupation, their habits of life, their course of study, everything, unfits them for the discharge of judicial functions. It is right, then, it is prudent and wise, that their decisions should be subjected to the examination of some revising power, without passion, without prejudice, without partiality, to weigh the testimony, and come to a just result. I said that I was not in favor of the law which passed at the last session of Congress. I do not believe that the naval officers themselves were in favor of that law. They knew very well the disadvantages to which they would be subjected by it; but they were like most men in extreme peril, clinging to the frailest and weakest supports; they believed that if Congress adjourned without passing any law for their relief, they would never have the opportunity of obtaining that justice which they ardently desired, and to which they considered themselves entitled; and they said, "at least, give us the opportunity of appearing publicly before the courts, of producing our evidence, and making up our records before the country; and whatever may be the judgments of the courts, however prejudice, or partiality, or any other unworthy motives may operate upon our judges, still we shall have secured the opportunity of coming before the public with this record in our hands; we will show the testimony on which we have been condemned, and we will appeal from those courts to that tribunal which is never deaf to the appeals of justice."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be supposed that the passage of this resolution will increase the expenses of the country; but that is not so. These officers are now in the service; they are receiving pay; some may be upon the reserved list; some on the furlough list; but I believe, of all those who would have an opportunity of making this appeal to the President, not more than three or four have been dropped from the naval service. They are, then, already in the service of the country. All they ask is, that they may be put upon the active-service list. I should rather say that all they ask is, that they may be enabled to submit the opinion of these courts to the judgment of the President, who may determine from their records whether they deserve to be placed on the active-service list or not. It involves no increase of expense. It puts these men in the position that, if not wanted for active-service, they will not be called into active service. It interferes with no promotion, and does not displace any officer now in the Navy. All that they ask is, that their cases may be tried on the principles that have governed the decision of all former cases. And, sir, is this reasonable request to be rejected by Congress? Do we find so much in these men to condemn that we will deny to them the small boon that has been heretofore freely extended to every man in like condition? I trust not; and until I am forced to a contrary opinion, I will continue to believe that Congress will do them the little justice that is asked.

Mr. WHITELEY obtained the floor; but yielded to

Mr. SEWARD, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at forty-five minutes after three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS SEWELL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, their Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues; and it was signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMMOND presented the memorial of R. Smith, administrator of Arthur Middleton, praying to be allowed the outfit of charged affairs, the duties of which office were discharged by him while secretary of legation at the Court of Madrid; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of John Mason and others, heirs of Jeremiah Gilman, an officer of the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed half pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. DURKEE presented the memorial of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company, praying that the State of Wisconsin may not be released from its indebtedness to the United States, for moneys received from the sale of the canal lands, without provision being made to protect the rights of the company; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SIMMONS presented the memorial of Catharine Denny, widow of John W. Denny, praying that her pension may be continued; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of the owners and conductors of the flouring mills at Georgetown, District of Columbia, and others, praying that the bill restricting the issue and circulation of bank notes in the District of Columbia may not become a law; which was ordered to lie on the table, and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Walter M. Gibson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a memorial of mechanics of the District of Columbia, reported a bill (S. No. 182,) for the enforcement of mechanics' liens upon buildings, &c., in the District of Columbia; which was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Halenan, for compensation for injuries to his property by the grading of New Jersey avenue, Washington, District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report; which was concurred in.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred papers relating to the claim of Lieutenant W. F. Lovell, and others, of the expedition in search of Dr. Kane, to extra pay, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. No. 20) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay to the officers and seamen of the expedition in search of Dr. Kane, the same rate of pay that was allowed the officers and seamen of the expedition under Lieutenant De Haven. The resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. PUGH. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 36) further to amend an "Act to divide the State of Illinois into two judicial districts," approved February 13, 1855, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report a general act as a substitute for that bill. I ask, if there be no objection, that it be now put on its passage.

The substitute was read. It provides that all suits, not of a local nature, hereafter to be brought in the circuit and district courts of the United States, in a district in any State containing more than one district, against a single defendant, shall be brought in the district in which the defendant resides; but if there be two or more defendants, residing in different districts in the same State, the plaintiff may sue in either district, and issue a duplicate writ against the defendants directed to the marshal of any other district within the State in which any of the defendants reside, on which duplicate writ the clerk issuing it shall indorse that it is a true copy of a writ sued out of the court of the proper district, and the original and duplicate writs so issued shall, when executed and returned into the office from which they issued, constitute one suit, and be proceeded on accordingly; and upon any judgment rendered in a suit so brought, process of execution may be issued and directed to the marshal of any district in the same State. In suits of a local nature, where the defendant resides in a different district in the same State than the one in which the suit is brought, the plaintiff may have original and final process against such defendant, directed to the marshal of the district in which he resides.

The second section provides that in all cases of a local nature, at law or in equity, where the land or other subject-matter of a fixed character lies partly in one district and partly in another district in the same State, the plaintiff may bring his action or suit in the circuit or district court of either district, and the court in which any such action or suit shall have been commenced shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide the same, and to cause mesne or final process to be issued and executed as fully as if the land or other subject-matter were wholly within the district for which such court is constituted.

Mr. STUART. It seems to me, if the Senator is going to move a substitute entirely different from the bill which was referred, he had better have it printed, so that we can see it.

Mr. PUGH. I will say to the Senator it is hardly worth while. In the case of Illinois, and in one or two other cases, we find, on examination, that in dividing the State into two districts, Congress did not make provision for process to run from one district to the other. In some cases, as in Ohio, a special provision of that sort has been made. Our object is to make it a universal rule, and not to pass special acts in each case. These are the provisions; they are relative to the subject-matter where the defendants reside in different districts of the same State. It does not go beyond that.

Mr. STUART. I understood the bill to change the general practice in the courts. If it is only to apply to special cases where a State is divided into judicial districts, I shall not object.

Mr. PUGH. It makes no change in the general practice. It is simply to apply the provisions of law relative to the division of Ohio, to Illinois, and other States which have been divided.

Mr. STUART. Where States are divided into two districts.

Mr. PUGH. Or more than two.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and the substitute of the committee was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. The title was amended so as to read, "A bill to provide for the issuing, service, and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States, in certain cases."

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Some time since, by order of the Senate, the following resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That, in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, there be printed ten thousand copies, five thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five thousand copies for distribution from the Coast Survey Office; and that the same be printed and bound, with the plates, in quarto form; and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

The committee have instructed me to report, in place of that resolution, the following:

Resolved, That, in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, there be printed five thousand copies for distribution from the Treasury Department; and that the same be printed and bound, with the plates, in quarto form; and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

This, it will be perceived, changes the course which has hitherto been adopted by the Senate in regard to the printing of this report. By the resolution of the Committee on Printing, we decline to recommend the printing of any of the Coast Survey reports for distribution by members of Congress. We do this upon the ground that it is a work entirely of a scientific nature, connected with commerce and navigation; and all the numbers which are transmitted by members of Congress to the interior States are lost to the public service. For these reasons, the committee think that the proper distribution of a work of this character should not be made in this way, and that the only proper point from which they can properly be distributed at all is from the executive department of the Government.

The committee propose that this distribution shall be made under the authority and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Heretofore, in a number of instances, Congress has chosen to deal directly with the subordinate bureaus of the Departments, thus building up an immediate connection on their part with Congress, and relieving the Secretaries from that responsibility which they owe to the public, and passing it to parties over whom we have no immediate jurisdiction. We have authorized, by the practice hitherto adopted, the distribution of five thousand of these documents by the Coast Survey Office. The Treasury Department is the Department to which the Coast Survey Office or bureau belongs. There should be some regular system established for the distribution of these documents, if they are to be distributed. The Department itself being made responsible, can always be reached by Congress, and the method it may adopt for the distribution of the reports of the Coast Survey can always be controlled, and can be corrected by Congress, and it will be the proper subject of animadversion in these Halls whenever the distribution may be unsatisfactory.

The committee are very well satisfied that, if the Secretary of the Treasury be made responsible for the distribution of these documents, he will take counsel with the Coast Survey Office, so that there will be a regular system adopted, and there will be an existing responsibility throughout the whole year on the part of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and an authority in operation all the time—that of the Treasury Department—to see that this public business is properly conducted. Although documents hitherto have been printed by Congress, and furnished for the use of subordinate bureaus, yet the committee do not believe that to be the correct practice; but think that, if any copies are to be distributed in that way, they should be furnished to the heads of the Departments, who will naturally consult with those bureaus, and require them to adopt regular systems, and the Departments themselves will be liable to us for the proper discharge of the duty of distribution.

It is under these circumstances that I am directed to report, that in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, there be printed five thousand copies for distribution from the Treasury Department; and that they be printed and bound in quarto form, with the plates; and that the printing of the plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. Hitherto these publications have extended to ten thousand copies. The committee regard the five thousand copies heretofore distributed by the members of the Senate, as little better than thrown away. There is a great and general outcry against the extent to which the public printing has gone; and the committee think it appropriate that we should cut off that portion of it which seems to be comparatively of no consequence. If the Senate shall believe that ten thousand copies should be printed, the committee think those ten thousand copies should all go for distribution to the Secretary of the Treasury's Department, so that they may be carried directly and properly into the channels of business which they are calculated to facilitate or affect. I ask that the resolution, as reported by the committee, may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, there be printed five thousand copies for distribution from the Treasury Department; that the same be printed and bound with the plates, in quarto form; and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. PEARCE. If the Senate desire to trench in the matter of printing, they will find me very zealous in coöperation with them on that subject; but I am not desirous of reducing the number of copies of the Coast Survey report, as proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. I know that there is an immense demand for them. I know that that demand is not wholly confined to the Atlantic coast, or that portion of our country which is watered by rivers flowing into the Atlantic or the Gulf. I know that even in the interior States there is some demand for these documents. I know that in every report, I think I may say, which comes from that Coast Survey Office, there is very valuable information, even to those residing in the interior. I believe we nowhere find such data for the correction of the magnetic variation as we do in the Coast Survey report, particular attention having been paid to that subject. As for the rest, I suppose it is not so immediately interesting to those in the interior as to those on the coast; but there is very great demand for them, as I said before. I know that the demand on me is very great for them. Still, I am very willing, if the Senate think we should not be the distributors of a document like this, that it shall be referred to others; but I know that there are nearly ten thousand names of persons connected with our navigation, and deeply interested in all the matters of which the Coast Survey report treats, to whom the documents are distributed by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Now, sir, how shall we effect a better distribution of these documents by referring it to the Secretary of the Treasury? Every one knows that that officer is so burdened already with the business which is devolved upon him inevitably, that the vast portion of that which is the proper business of his Department is performed by other heads and hands than his own; and if you were to assign him this duty of distributing the Coast Survey reports, he would turn it over to some subordinate clerk. It is likely the distribution would be better effected by him than by the intelligent head of the Coast Survey Office, who is acquainted with mercantile men and persons engaged in the navigating interest all through the country—who has no motive on earth to distribute these documents partially and where they will be of no use, but every motive to put them in the hands of those to whom they will be useful? Even his own reputation would induce him to do that. He is well acquainted with that class of persons throughout the country; probably better acquainted with them than the Secretary of the Treasury we now have, or any we are likely to have. At all events, he is much more likely to give his personal attention and superintendence to that matter than the head of the Treasury Department, who must, as I have said before, turn it over to a subordinate clerk. What better guarantee can you have for the performance of that duty by some subordinate clerk than under the intelligent gentleman at the head of the Coast Survey?

I trust, whatever we shall do, we shall not, at all events, assign it to the Secretary of the Treasury; because, in effect, that will be giving to a subordinate clerk of the Treasury Department the distribution of these documents. I know they are of great interest—and I am sure the whole Senate is aware of it—at all events to the commercial and navigating interest. They contain vast numbers of maps in advance of the finished maps which it is the business of the Coast Survey to complete. They publish every year skeleton maps, which, though they are not complete, furnish very important information to the navigator.

I have had occasion, heretofore, to speak on the subject, and to point out the numerous dangers of our navigation, long unknown, until they were discovered by the operations of the Coast Survey, even in the most frequented parts of the waters of the United States. For example: in Delaware bay, and in my own Chesapeake bay, and in the neighborhood of Boston, there were dangers to navigation concealed from view, and never found out, except by some wreck, until their exact position had been indicated and fixed by the operations of the Coast Survey. All these discoveries are immediately made known through these skeleton maps, and the small quantity of text which accompanies them, and which make up the Coast Survey report. I trust, therefore, that the resolution will not be passed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am myself satisfied, Mr. President, from the information which we have received, that there is an expenditure in printing which is not justified by any just wants of the country, and I will cheerfully go with the chairman of the Committee on Printing to correct any of the evils which may exist in that department. I have some knowledge of the question. I served long upon that committee; I know the manner in which that printing has accumulated upon us. Notwithstanding all that, sir, I regard this as the last document printed by the Senate at which the ax should be laid. I hold, in importance, it is not equaled by any other document that emanates from Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator will allow me, as we wish to get along with this subject, to say that the utility of the publication is not questioned by the committee. If the Senator wishes to bring that point into the debate, I think he will find many here who are disposed to abridge this whole bureau. There are forty-four or forty-five thousand dollars to be expended for printing this report alone, if we adopt the resolution as introduced in the first place; but the utility of the work is not brought in question by the committee. They have brought in question no more than the method of distribution, and the number of documents to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I did not understand from the report of the committee that the utility was brought in question, but it was as to the number which it is proposed to print that I was speaking; and the importance of the thing is certainly a very good reason why the usual number should be printed. I, with the honorable Senator from Maryland, would not abridge this work in number; I would not change the mode of distribution. If, however, it is wiser and better to allow any department of the Government to distribute either the number reported or any other number which shall be ordered, then the Senate can so order. I would prefer, if there are five thousand printed, that a portion of them should be appropriated to Senators. In all the Atlantic States, more perhaps at the North, where there is most of navigation, but in all the Atlantic States at least, there is no work published by Congress which measures in importance with this.

But, sir, if the report of the committee should be adopted as to the number, I then object to taking the distribution from Professor Bache, and transferring it to the Secretary of the Treasury. It is reversing the order in which we have always proceeded; and, in my judgment, it is not necessary to be adopted at this time. I know it is suggested that we have a right to hold the Secretary of the Treasury to an accountability, and that a subordinate officer is not within our control. That is all very true; but when this matter goes to the Secretary of the Treasury, it passes from the hands of the Secretary into the hands of a subordinate clerk, who has no interest, who has no feeling, perhaps, beyond that which is measured by the simple consideration of his compensation. How is it with Professor Bache? It is the work of his life—it is the pride of his life. He and his employes are all along the coast; they are better acquainted with the commercial men; they are better acquainted with the points where the work may be appropriately distributed, than any other men in the country, save those who live in the localities. I say this is a proposition reversing the usual order. We direct a large number of the Patent Office reports to be printed, and out of that number we appropriate a certain quantity for the use of the Commissioner of Patents. Why not divert them, for the same reason, to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will say to the Senator that that is the intention of the committee; and I am instructed to make that report.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well. I only say this proposes to change the usual course, and to take the distribution of this work away from a man who has the deepest interest and the best knowledge on the subject, and transfer it to a clerk who has no interest in it at all. So in relation to the Land Office report; additional numbers are ordered, and they go to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. All these things are appropriate; they are best; in my judgment they are wisest, because the person into whose hands they go is the head of that bureau, which has the best knowledge of the manner in which they should be distributed, and will direct them in those channels where they will do the most good.

Now, sir, I hope, first, that the Senate will not conclude to abridge the number; and I hope, secondly, that they will not change the mode of distribution; and that they will appropriate, of whatever number they may print, a portion to the members of the Senate for distribution by them. I know very well—I am sensible that to the commercial and Atlantic States this report is more important than to the interior States; I grant that. It is also true of almost any and every document you print, that you may find some locality of the country to which it is more appropriate, in which a deeper interest is felt in the question to which it relates, than in others; but still, because that may be the case, I infer there are no Senators on this floor who do not find many of their constituents who are interested directly in this work, and a number vastly beyond that which they can supply. My friend from New York [Mr. KING] suggests that it should go to colleges and universities, as containing scientific information, to be preserved in their libraries. They want a portion of that information as much in the interior as they do in the Atlantic States. I hope, sir, that the Senate, in its wisdom, will not adopt this report.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator from Maine and the Senator from Maryland have spoken in opposition to the report of the committee. I submit to the Senate that each of those gentlemen may be very excellent agents for the distribution of works of this character; I do not pretend to dispute it; but I can say for myself—and there are many Senators around me who, I presume, will frankly acknowledge the same thing for themselves—that I am wholly unfit to make any distribution of this document; and, if I were fit to make a distribution of it, I know I have no place within my State to which I could transmit it profitably, unless to a college, or some institution of learning. This, undeniably, is the general feeling of the Senate. I know it is so; and gentlemen utter it around me as I stand here speaking to you. It is a fact; yet, to enable the Senator from Maine, and my honorable friend from Maryland, and a few other gentlemen, to distribute, out of the five thousand, what would be their proportion—eighty copies each—there are five thousand to be printed, the great mass of which will be wasted.

Mr. PEARCE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. PEARCE. So far as I am concerned, I do not care about five thousand copies being printed for the use of the Senate. I wish ten thousand printed, because I think the navigating and commercial interests of the country require that many to be printed. I think the vast number of vessels, to all of which these Coast Survey reports are of great value because of the maps they contain, are so many that ten thousand will by no means overstock them; but I am perfectly willing to reduce the number printed for the use of the Senate. A thousand or fifteen hundred would be enough, so far as I care anything about it. The rest I should like to have distributed by the Coast Survey Office.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Hitherto ten thousand copies have been printed, five thousand of them going to the members of the Senate for distribution. You call on us to curtail that portion of the public printing which it is possible to curtail. As a general allegation, I find no one who disputes that the public printing is becoming an extravagant and vicious system, wasteful to the last degree. So pointedly and permanently is this idea fixed on the public mind, that the abuses of the system are condemned from the lips of every gentleman in the Senate who says anything in regard to it. Each Senator who speaks of it vies with the other, whoever he may be, to see who shall, with the greatest bitterness, and in the broadest manner, denounce, totally, the vicious system of public printing we now have.

Here is the first effort made to reduce it. Here is a proposition that involves the expenditure of $40,000, which we propose to reduce. We do not cut it off altogether because of its inutility, but to reduce it and to alter the manner of distributing the work. We feel that the present mode of distribution is vain and a waste of the public means; and to that extent we propose to cut it off. The honorable Senator from Maine cannot bring himself to sustain a proposition which will relieve him from the crying sorrow that oppresses his heart in regard to the vicious nature of our public printing.

The honorable Senator from Maryland says, he does not care about the five thousand copies for distribution by members of the Senate. He knows how to make a proper disposition of these works. He has been long connected with this particular branch of service, so far as his duties on this floor are concerned, and is more familiar, I believe, with it, than any member of this body. I appreciate that declaration on his part. But mark you, at the very moment that he makes that declaration, he calls for an increase of this printing over and above what it ever has been heretofore; for I hold that there has never heretofore been any enlightened or intelligent distribution of more than one thousand copies of this document out of the five thousand given to the members of the Senate. Let us have the same amount now that heretofore has been distributed intelligently—namely, the five thousand delivered to the Coast Survey Office, and the one thousand distributed properly by this body; and that will be six thousand copies. The Senator from Maryland wishes to add four thousand copies to that number. I want to cut off those four thousand. That is precisely the difference between him and myself on that point.

Now, as to the utility of the work; it is not for the Committee on Printing to take up that question. That is a question which belongs to the Senate, and should be brought before the body by some other committee. Whenever the utility of the work shall be debated here, on a proper occasion, I shall express my doubts as to its great utility. I am satisfied that an institution, a bureau, has been growing from the moment of its establishment, until it has become a concern that I think ought to be looked into, to speak frankly about it. It has grown incessantly and constantly. From the inquiry I can make—it is true, it is not official, or not of that character upon which I can place great reliance—I learn that it has been growing steadily from year to year, and I can see no period when there will be a cessation of the survey of the waters along the coast of the United States; no period at which the information will all have been obtained, and the work completed.

The Senator from Maine speaks of the necessity of the distribution. I believe I have said enough about the distribution by the members of the Senate. I will speak now as to the manner of distribution, wherein the committee propose to confer the power on the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator from Maine says we propose to take it away from the gentleman at the head of that bureau, the object of whose life it has been to perfect this system, and to whom it is very dear. I should like to know whether, because particular branches of the public service are dear to the hearts of the gentlemen who have them in charge, the Senator will ask us to base our action on that ground? What have we to do with that? That is not a legitimate matter to be presented here. Whatever may be the affection of any public officer for any particular work, I see no occasion for us to pay any respect or regard to it in our action. The public service is the subject to be considered by us, and nothing else.

The Senator from Maine dwells upon the fact that we propose to take this distribution from the office containing, in such an eminent degree, the intelligence and capacity of which he spoke, and put it into the hands of some clerk under the Secretary of the Treasury, as he said. I would ask if the Secretaries of the Treasury, who have held that position under any past Administration in this Government, are justly entitled to a criticism of that character, especially in connection with a branch of service deemed by the honorable gentleman himself to be of so much public importance?

What would be the course that would be taken in this matter? I submit to Senators that the Secretary of the Treasury would proceed at once naturally to perform this public service in the very best and most effective manner possible. What step would he take, in the first place, in order to do so? His very first step would be to call on that bureau to inform him as to the manner in which they have hitherto distributed these documents; his next step, I take it, would be to request the head of the bureau to submit some regular system upon which the distribution should be conducted, so that rules and regulations might be made in regard to it, and so that it would not be left discretionary with a subordinate head of a bureau. Those regulations, of necessity, would allow the whole distribution to go into the hands of that subordinate head of a bureau. The Secretary, as a wise officer, would take that course, and there would exist some responsibility over that officer; for, with all his pride in and regard for the service, Professor Bache may not live always. We are not legislating for men, but for the service. The service would at once go into the hands of the subordinate, subject to responsibility to the head of the Department, who is responsible to us, and who can be made accountable for the discharge of his duties. The fact is, that what we propose is nothing more than an additional accountability, on the part of a subordinate head of a bureau, to his superior officer, the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible here. Through him the Government is made responsible. If Congress keeps it in the hands of a bureau, every Administration may reply: "we are not responsible for that bureau; you have not given us charge of that business; you have chosen to give it to a bureau that is beneath us, it is true, in point of dignity, but you leave it to their discretion entirely." The system is vicious, and there is an absence of that responsibility which undoubtedly ought to exist.

I really speak of this subject from some calm consideration, and from conversation with those in whose judgment I have very great confidence. The distribution in this instance, I am sure, will not be taken from Professor Bache—not that the Secretary of the Treasury has ever expressed such a wish, because I have never heard of his doing so; but the natural course of things is, that the Secretary of the Treasury would adopt a system for him to carry out. Then, if the present head of that bureau, or any future one that may be appointed, shall fail to comply with that system of distribution, the Department will be the first to find it out and rectify it, and it will not depend on the uncertain watchfulness of Congress to ascertain what abuses may be there. I believe it is absolutely essential that we should put all these officers in a position to be as early, as immediately, and as precisely held to a rigid responsibility as it is possible by the legislation that may be had here to render them, on this subject as well as on all others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the Senator from Arkansas closes his remarks, I wish to ask him a question or two, with his permission.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The first question is, what is the whole amount that the printing of these ten thousand copies will cost?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I shall not state the sum to a cent, but I think it is over forty-four thousand dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then suppose you deduct one half—five thousand—how much will that deduct from the whole amount?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I cannot give you the exact sum, but it costs about one third less.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As much as that?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. My belief is about one third less; but I cannot state precisely.

Mr. KING. What is the cost of the five thousand?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The cost of the printing of what is called the usual number, in which all the heavy expense is included, will be $7,425 30. We are now acting upon the propriety of printing extra numbers. It is estimated that each thousand extra copies afterwards will cost $3,452; multiplying that by ten would give $34,520; one half of $34,520 is precisely the amount that will be saved by cutting off the extra five thousand copies. Seventeen thousand two hundred and sixty dollars is the amount which will be saved by the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing.

I shall not detain the Senate longer on this matter. I will only say that the committee sincerely believe that the action which they propose, not only in this case but in similar ones, is the best policy which can be adopted. They are satisfied it will not change the nature of the distribution; except, perhaps, to correct some vices that may have grown up. I am very certain that in some of the other bureaus there have been very considerable vices growing up from the system of irresponsibility. That there have been any in this particular instance I cannot say. I am satisfied in regard to the Patent Office report, that the system of distribution, irresponsible to any head other than Congress, has been distinguished by improper action—I will not say such as is dishonorable, at all; but certainly improper and improvident action and conduct. I feel satisfied of that in the history of the past. I see no reflection that would be cast on the head of this particular bureau, if this resolution should be adopted.

Then passing that by, I appeal to the Senate, on the first effort we make, where I think we show a very plain case, in regard to this public printing, for their support, that we may begin somewhere to curtail a system which all men unite in declaring the most vicious, the most extravagant, and most outrageous that has grown up in this Government.

Mr. MALLORY. I presume the Senate will fully concur with the honorable Senator from Arkansas in the last assertion which he has made; and I presume that a general desire exists in the Senate to curtail our expenditures for public printing. With somewhat of that view, we have raised a very able committee—a committee in whose judgment I have the most entire confidence; and whenever they come in here and deliberately recommend a curtailment of any particular article of printing, I shall with great pleasure support the committee; but I differ from my friend from Arkansas in relation to the distribution of these books. Whatever number may be printed, I respectfully contend that the Coast Survey office, having an immediate interest in the production of the work, an esprit du corps and a pride, having already made its arrangements during past time for the best distribution of this work, and being a permanent body, improving its system from time to time, is the most appropriate body for its distribution; and that the works distributed by the Coast Survey will reach those channels where they will do the most good. I also contend that, whatever number may be printed, the members of the Senate should have an opportunity of distributing them—a portion of them, at least. I say nothing for the States that have no seaboard.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to say that it is not proposed by this resolution to deprive the bureau of the distribution of this work; it only proposes to place it in charge of the Department under which the head of this bureau is employed. It does not take it away from him, but it renders him responsible to his superior, the head of the Department, who is immediately responsible to us.

Mr. MALLORY. I was going on to observe that, for those who come from the Atlantic seaboard, I may safely say that no document which is distributed by Congress is more acceptable to a large number of their constituents than this work, the report of the Coast Survey. It is very eagerly sought for, not only by those immediately engaged in navigation, but by those remotely connected with it. I will make no particular point on my friend from Arkansas, as to the distribution between the Coast Survey office and the Treasury Department, for I am willing to concede that the Secretary of the Treasury would probably follow the system which he found already in existence, and perhaps I may yield to my friend from Arkansas, that he is better versed on that point than any of us; but so far as the distribution is concerned by the Senate, although the Senator from Arkansas, having no seaboard in his State, may not feel able to make a proper distribution of this work, I know that those who come from the Atlantic seaboard earnestly desire the opportunity of doing so. [Question.]

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to ask, as a matter of information in regard to the business before the Senate, what becomes of this resolution? May it be called up to-morrow in the morning hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It may be called up to-morrow at any time after petitions and reports. If not called up, it takes its place on the Calendar.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the special order, the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, eight years ago we slew the Wilnot proviso in the Senate Chamber, and buried it with triumphal demonstrations, under the floors of the Capitol. Four years later we exploded altogether the time-honored system of governing the Territories by Federal rules and regulations, and published and proclaimed in its stead a new gospel of popular sovereignty, whose ways, like those of wisdom, were to be ways of pleasantness, and all of whose paths were supposed to be flowery paths of peace. Nevertheless, the question whether there shall be slavery or no slavery in the Territories, is again the stirring passage of the day. The restless proviso has burst the cerements of the grave, and striking hands here in our very presence with the gentle spirit of popular sovereignty run mad, is seen raging freely in our Halls, scattering dismay among the administration benches in both Houses of Congress. Thus an old and unwelcome lesson is read to us anew. The question of slavery in the Federal Territories, which are the nurseries of future States, independently of all its moral and humane elements, involves a dynastical struggle of two antagonistical systems, the labor of slaves and the labor of freemen, for mastery in the Federal Union. One of these systems partakes of an aristocratic character; the other is purely democratic. Each one of the existing States has staked, or it will ultimately stake, not only its internal welfare, but also its influence in the Federal councils, on the decision of that contest. Such a struggle is not to be arrested, quelled, or reconciled, by temporary expedients or compromises.

Mr. President, I always engage reluctantly in these discussions, which awaken passion just in the degree that their importance demands the impartial umpirage of reason. This reluctance deepens now, when I look around me, and count the able contestants who have newly entered the lists on either side; and shadowy forms of many great and honored statesmen who once were eloquent in these disputes, but whose tongues have since become stringless instruments, rise up before me. It is, however, a maxim in military science, that, in preparation for war, every one should think as if the last event depended on his counsel; and, in every great battle, each one should fight as if he were the only champion. The principle, perhaps, is equally sound in political affairs. If it be possible, I shall perform my present duty in such a way as to wound no just sensibilities. I must, however, review the action of Presidents, Senates, and Congresses. I do indeed, with all my heart, reject the instruction given by the Italian master of political science, which teaches that all men are bad by nature, and that they will not fail to show this depravity whenever they have a fair opportunity. But jealousy of executive power is a high practical virtue in Republics; and we shall find it hard to deny the justice of the character of free legislative bodies which Charles James Fox drew, when he said that the British House of Commons, of which he was at the moment equally an ornament and an idol, like every other popular assembly, must be viewed as a mass of men capable of too much attachment and too much animosity; capable of being biased by weak, and even wicked, motives, and liable to be governed by ministerial influence, by caprice, and by corruption.

Mr. President, I propose to inquire, in the first place, why the question before us is attended by real or apparent dangers.

I think our apprehensions are in part due to the intrinsic importance of the transaction concerned. Whenever we add a new column to the Federal colonnade, we need to lay its foundations so firmly, to shape its shaft with such just proportions, to poise it with such exactness, and to adjust its connections with the existing structure so carefully, that instead of falling prematurely, and dragging other and venerable columns with it to the ground, it may stand erect forever, increasing the grandeur and the stability of the whole massive and imperial fabric. Still, the admission of a new State is not necessarily or even customarily attended by either embarrassments or alarms. We have already admitted eighteen new States without serious commotions, except in the cases of Missouri, Texas, and California. We are even now admitting two others, Minnesota and Oregon; and these transactions go on so smoothly, that only close observers are aware that we are thus consolidating our dominion on the shores of Lake Superior, and almost at the gates of the Arctic ocean.

It is manifest that the apprehended difficulties in the present case have some relation to the dispute concerning slavery which is raging within the Territory of Kansas. Yet it must be remembered that nine of the new States which have been admitted expressly established slavery, or tolerated it, and nine of them forbade it. The excitement, therefore, is due to peculiar circumstances. I think there are three of them, namely:

First. That whereas, in the beginning, the ascendancy of the slave States was absolute, it is now being reversed.

Second. That whereas, heretofore, the national Government favored this change of balance from the slave States to the free States, it has now reversed this policy, and opposes the change.

Third. That national intervention in the Territories in favor of slave labor and slave States, is opposed to the natural, social, and moral developments of the Republic.

It seems almost unnecessary to demonstrate the first of these propositions. In the beginning, there were twelve slave States, and only one that was free. Now, six of those twelve have become free; and there are sixteen free States to fifteen slave States. If the three candidates now here, Kansas, Minnesota, and Oregon, shall be admitted as free States, then there will be nineteen free States to fifteen slave States. Originally, there were twenty-four Senators of slave States, and only two of a free State; now, there are thirty-two Senators of free States, and thirty of slave States. In the first constitutional Congress, the slave States had fifty-seven Representatives, and the one free State had only eight; now, the free States have one hundred and forty-four Representatives, while the slave States have only ninety. These changes have happened in a period during which the slave States have almost uninterruptedly exercised paramount influence in the Government, and notwithstanding the Constitution itself has opposed well-known checks to the relative increase of representation of free States. I assume, therefore, the truth of my first proposition.

I suggested, sir, a second circumstance, namely, that whereas, in the earlier age of the Republic, the national Government favored this change, yet it has since altogether reversed that policy, and it now opposes the change. I do not claim that heretofore the national Government always, or even habitually, intervened in the Territories in favor of the free States, but only that such intervention preponderated. While slavery existed in all of the States but one, at the beginning, yet it was far less intense in the northern than in some of the southern States. All of the former contemplated an early emancipation. The fathers seem not to have anticipated an enlargement of the national territory; consequently, they expected that all the new States to be thereafter admitted would be organized upon subdivisions of the then existing States, or upon divisions of the then existing national domain. That domain lay behind the thirteen States, and stretched from the Lakes to the Gulf, and was bounded westward by the Mississippi. It was naturally divided by the Ohio river, and the Northwest Territory and the Southwest Territory were organized on that division. It was foreseen, even then, that the new

States to be admitted would ultimately overbalance the thirteen original ones. They were, however, mainly to be yet planted and matured in the desert, with the agency of human labor.

The fathers knew only of two kinds of labor, the same which now exist among ourselves—namely, the labor of African slaves and the labor of freemen. The former then predominated in this country, as it did throughout the continent. A confessed deficiency of slave labor could be supplied only by domestic increase, and by continuance of the then existing importation from Africa. The supply of free labor depended on domestic increase, and a voluntary immigration from Europe. Settlements, which had thus early taken on a free-labor character or a slave-labor character, were already maturing in those parts of old States which were to be ultimately detached and formed into new States. When new States of this class were organized, they were admitted promptly, either as free States or as slave States, without objection. Thus Vermont, a free State, was admitted in 1791; Kentucky, a slave State, in 1792; and Tennessee, also a slave State, in 1796. Five new States were contemplated to be erected in the Northwest Territory. Practically it was unoccupied, and therefore open to labor of either kind. The one kind or the other, in the absence of any anticipated emulation, would predominate just as Congress should intervene to favor it. Congress intervened in favor of free labor. This, indeed, was an act of the Continental Congress, but it was confirmed by the first constitutional Congress. The fathers simultaneously adopted three other measures of less direct intervention. First, they initiated in 1789, and completed in 1803, the absolute suppression of the African slave trade. Secondly, they organized systems of foreign commerce and navigation, which stimulated voluntary immigration from Europe. Thirdly, they established an easy, simple, and uniform process of naturalization. The change of the balance of power from the slave States to the free States, which we are now witnessing, is due chiefly to those four early measures of national intervention in favor of free labor. It would have taken place much sooner, if the borders of the Republic had remained unchanged. The purchase of Louisiana and the acquisition of Florida, however, were transactions resulting from high political necessities, in disregard of the question between free and slave labor. In admitting the new State of Louisiana, which was organized on the slave-labor settlement of New Orleans, Congress practiced the same neutrality which it had before exercised in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. No serious dispute arose until 1819, when Missouri, organized within the former province of Louisiana, upon a slave-labor settlement in St. Louis, applied for admission as a slave State; and Arkansas was manifestly preparing to appear soon in the same character. The balance of power between the slave States and the free States was already reduced to an equilibrium, and the eleven free States had an equal representation with the eleven slave States in the Senate of the United States. The slave States unanimously insisted on an unqualified admission of Missouri. The free States, with less unanimity, demanded that the new State should renounce slavery. The controversy seemed to shake the Union to its foundations, and it was terminated by a compromise. Missouri was admitted as a slave State. Arkansas, rather by implication than by express agreement, was to be admitted, and it was afterwards admitted, as a slave State. On the other hand, slavery was forever prohibited in all that part of the old province of Louisiana yet remaining unoccupied, which lay north of the parallel of 36° 30' north latitude. The reservation for free labor included the immense region now known as the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, and seemed ample for eight, ten, or more free States. The severity of the struggle, and the conditions of the compromise, indicated very plainly, however, that the vigor of national intervention in favor of free labor and free States was exhausted. Still, the existing statutes were adequate to secure an ultimate ascendancy of the free States.

The policy of intervention in favor of slave labor and slave States began with the further removal of the borders of the Republic. I cheerfully admit that this policy has not been persistent or exclusive, and claim only that it has been and yet is predominant. I am not now to deplore the annexation of Texas. I remark simply that it was a bold measure, of doubtful constitutionality, distinctly adopted as an act of intervention in favor of slave labor, and made or intended to be made most effective by the stipulation that the new State of Texas may hereafter be divided and so reorganized as to constitute five slave States. This great act cast a long shadow before it—a shadow which perplexed the people of the free States. It was then that a feeble social movement, which aimed by moral persuasion at the manumission of slaves, gave place to political organizations, which have ever since gone on increasing in energy and extent, directed against a further extension of slavery in the United States. The war between the United States and Mexico, and the acquisition of the Mexican provinces of New Mexico and Upper California, the fruits of that war, were so immediately and directly consequences of the annexation of Texas, that all of those events, in fact, may be regarded as constituting one act of intervention in favor of slave labor and slave States. The field of the strife between the two systems had become widely enlarged. Indeed, it was now continental. The amazing mineral wealth of California stimulated settlement there into a rapidity like that of vegetation. The Mexican laws which prevailed in the newly-acquired Territories dedicated them to free labor, and thus the astounding question arose for the first time, whether the United States of America, whose Constitution was based on the principle of the political equality of all men, would blight and curse with slavery a conquered land which enjoyed universal freedom. The slave States denied the obligation of these laws, and insisted on their abrogation. The free States maintained them, and demanded their confirmation through the enactment of the Wilmot proviso. The slave States and the free States were yet in equilibrium. The controversy continued here two years. The settlers of the new Territories became impatient, and precipitated a solution of the question. They organized new free States in California and New Mexico. The Mormons also framed a Government in Utah. Congress, after a bewildering excitement, determined the matter by another compromise. It admitted California a free State, dismembered New Mexico, transferring a large district free from slavery to Texas, whose laws carried slavery over it, and subjected the residue to a territorial government, as it also subjected Utah, and stipulated that the future States to be organized in those Territories should be admitted either as free States or as slave States, as they should elect. I pass over the portions of this arrangement which did not bear directly on the point in conflict. The Federal Government presented this compromise to the people, as a comprehensive, final, and perpetual adjustment of all then existing and all future questions having any relation to the subject of slavery within the Territories or elsewhere. The country accepted it with that proverbial facility which free States practice, when time brings on a stern conflict which popular passions provoke, and at a distance defy. This halcyon peace, however, had not ceased to be celebrated, when the new-born necessities of trade, travel, and labor, required an opening of the region in the old province of Louisiana, north of 36° 30', which had been reserved in 1820, and dedicated to free labor and free States. The old question was revived in regard to that Territory, and took the narrow name of the Kansas question, just as the stream which Lake Superior discharges, now contracting itself into rivers and precipitating itself down rapids and cataracts, and now spreading out its waters into broad seas, assumes a new name with every change of form, but continues nevertheless the same majestic and irresistible flood under every change, increasing in depth and in volume until it loses itself in the all-absorbing ocean.

No one had ever said or even thought that the law of freedom in this region could be repealed, impaired, or evaded. Its constitutionality had indeed been questioned at the time of its enactment; but this, with all other objections, had been surrendered as part of the compromise. It was regarded as bearing the sanction of the public faith, as it certainly had those of time and acquiescence. But the slaveholding people of Missouri looked across the border, into Kansas, and coveted the land. The slave States could not fail to sympathize with them. It seemed as if no organization of government could be effected in the Territory. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] projected a scheme. Under his vigorous leading, Congress created two Territories—Nebraska and Kansas. The former (the more northern one) might, it was supposed, be settled without slavery, and become a free State, or several free States. The latter (the southern one) was accessible to the slave States, bordered on one of them, and was regarded as containing a region inviting to slaveholders. So it might be settled by them, and become one or more slave States. Thus indirectly a further compromise might be effected, if the Missouri prohibition of 1820 should be abrogated. Congress abrogated it, with the special and effective coöperation of the President, and thus the national Government directly intervened in favor of slave labor. Loud remonstrances against the measure on the ground of its violation of the national faith were silenced by clamorous avowals of a discovery that Congress had never had any right to intervene in the Territories for or against slavery, but that the citizens of the United States residing within a Territory had, like the people of every State, exclusive authority and jurisdiction over slavery, as one of the domestic relations. The Kansas-Nebraska act only recognized and affirmed this right, as it was said. The theory was not indeed new, but a vagrant one, which had for some time gone about seeking among political parties the charity of adoption, under the name of squatter sovereignty. It was now brought to the front, and baptized with the more attractive appellation of popular sovereignty. It was idle for a time to say that, under the Missouri prohibition, freemen in the Territories had all the rights which freemen could desire—perfect freedom to do everything but establish slavery. Popular sovereignty offered the indulgence of a taste of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of evil as well as of good—a more perfect freedom. Inasmuch as the proposition seemed to come from a free State, the slave States could not resist its seductions, although sagacious men saw that they were delusive. Consequently, a small and ineffectual stream of slave labor was at once forced into Kansas, engineered by a large number of politicians, advocates at once of slavery and of the Federal Administration, who proceeded with great haste to prepare the means so to carry the first elections as to obtain the laws necessary for the protection of slavery. It is one thing, however, to expunge statutes from a national code, and quite another to subvert a national institution; even though it be only a monument of freedom located in the desert. Nebraska was resigned to free labor without a struggle, and Kansas became a theater of the first actual national conflict between slaveholding and free-labor immigrants, met face to face, to organize, through the machinery of republican action, a civil community.

The parties differed as widely in their appointments, conduct, and bearing, as in their principles. The free laborers came into the Territory with money, horses, cattle, implements, and engines, with energies concentrated by associations and strengthened by the recognition of some of the States. They marked out farms, and sites for mills, towns, and cities, and proceeded at once to build, to plow, and to sow. They proposed to debate, to discuss, to organize peacefully, and to vote, and to abide the canvass. The slave-labor party entered the Territory irregularly, staked out possessions, marked them, and then, in most instances, withdrew to the States from which they had come, to sell their new acquisitions, or to return and resume them, as circumstances should render one course or the other expedient. They left armed men in the Territory to keep watch and guard, and to summon external aid, either to vote or to fight, as should be found necessary. They were fortified by the favor of the Administration, and assumed to act with its authority. Intolerant of debate, and defiant, they hurried on the elections which were to be so perverted that an usurpation should be established. They rang out their summons when the appointed time came, and armed bands of partisans, from States near and remote, invaded and entered the Territory, with banners, ammunition, provisions, and forage, and encamped around the polls. They seized the ballot-boxes, replaced the judges of elections with partisans of their own, drove away their opponents, filled the boxes with as many votes as the exigencies demanded, and, leaving the results to be returned by reliable hands, they marched back again to their distant homes, to celebrate the conquest, and exult in the prospect of the establishment of slavery upon the soil so long consecrated to freedom. Thus, in a single day, they became parents of a State without affection for it, and childless again without bereavement. In this first hour of trial, the new system of popular sovereignty signally failed—failed because it is impossible to organize, by one single act, in one day, a community perfectly free, perfectly sovereign, and perfectly constituted, out of elements unassimilated, unarranged, and uncomposed. Free labor rightfully won the day. Slave labor wrested the victory to itself by fraud and violence. Instead of a free republican government in the Territory, such as popular sovereignty had promised, there was then and thenceforth a hateful usurpation. This usurpation proceeded without delay and without compunction to disfranchise the people. It transferred the slave code of Missouri to Kansas, without stopping in all cases to substitute the name of the new Territory for that of the old State. It practically suspended popular elections for three years—the usurping Legislature assigning that term for its own members, while it committed all subordinate trusts to agents appointed by itself. It barred the courts and the juries to its adversaries by test oaths, and made it a crime to think what one pleased, and to write and print what one thought. It borrowed all the enginery of tyranny, but the torture, from the practice of the Stuarts. The party of free labor appealed to the Governor (Reeder) to correct the false election returns. He intervened, but ineffectually, and yet even for that intervention was denounced by the Administration organs; and, after long and unacceptable explanations, he was removed from office by the President. The new Governor (Shannon) sustained for a while the usurpation, but failed to effect the subjugation of the people, although he organized as a militia an armed partisan band of adventurers who had intruded themselves into the Territory to force slavery upon the people. With the active cooperation of this band, the party of slave labor disarmed the free-State emigrants, who had now learned the necessity of being prepared for self-defense, on the borders of the Territory, and on the distant roads and rivers which led into it. They destroyed a bridge that free-labor men used in their way to the seat of government, sacked a hotel where they lodged, and broke up and cast into the river a press which was the organ of their cause.

The people of Kansas, thus deprived, not merely of self-government, but even of peace, tranquillity, and security, fell back upon the inalienable revolutionary right of voluntary reorganization. They determined, however, with admirable temper, judgment, and loyalty, to conduct their proceedings for this purpose in deference and subordination to the authority of the Federal Union, and according to the line of safe precedents.

After due elections, open to all the inhabitants of the Territory, they organized provisionally a State government at Topeka; and by the hands of provisional Senators, and a provisional Representative, they submitted their constitution to Congress, and prayed to be admitted as a free State into the Federal Union. The Federal authorities lent no aid to this movement; but, on the contrary, the President and Senate contemptuously rejected it, and denounced it as treason, and all its actors and abettors as disloyal to the Union. An army was dispatched into the Territory, intended indeed to preserve peace, but at the same time to obey and sustain the usurpation. The provisional Legislature, which had met to confer and to adopt further means to urge the prayers of the people upon Congress, were dispersed by the army, and the State officers, provisionally elected, who had committed no criminal act, were arrested, indicted, and held in the Federal camp as State prisoners. Nevertheless, the people of Kansas did not acquiesce. The usurpation remained a barren authority, defied, derided, and despised.

A national election was now approaching. Excitement within and sympathies without the Territory must be allayed. Governor Shannon was removed, and Mr. Geary was appointed his successor. He exacted submission to the statutes of the usurpation, but promised equality in their administration. He induced a repeal of some of those statutes which were most obviously unconstitutional, and declared an amnesty for political offenses. He persuaded the Legislature of the usurpation to ordain a call for a convention at Lecompton, to form a constitution, if the measure should be approved by a popular vote at an election to be held for that purpose. To vote at such an election was to recognize and tolerate the usurpation, as well as to submit to disfranchising laws, and to hazard a renewal of the frauds and violence by which the usurpation had been established. On no account would the Legislature agree that the projected constitution should be submitted to the people, after it should have been perfected by the convention. The refusal of this just measure, so necessary to the public security in case of surprise and fraud, was a confession of the purpose on the part of the usurpation to carry a constitution into effect by surprise and fraud. The Governor insisted on this provision, and demanded of the President of the United States the removal of a partial and tyrannical judge. He failed to gain either measure, and incurred the displeasure of the usurpation by seeking them. He fled from the Territory. The free-State party stood aloof from the polls, and a canvass showed that some two thousand three hundred, less than a third of the people of the Territory, had sanctioned the call of a convention, while the presence of the army alone held the Territory under a forced truce.

At this juncture, the new Federal Administration came in, under a President who had obtained success by the intervention at the polls of a third party—an ephemeral organization, built upon a foreign and frivolous issue, which had just strength enough and life enough to give to a pro-slavery party the aid required to produce that untoward result. The new President, under a show of moderation, masked a more effectual intervention than that of his predecessor, in favor of slave labor and a slave State. Before coming into office, he approached or was approached by the Supreme Court of the United States. On their docket was, through some chance or design, an action which an obscure negro man in Missouri had brought for his freedom against his reputed master. The court had arrived at the conclusion, on solemn argument, that inasmuch as this unfortunate negro had, through some ignorance or chicanery in special pleading, admitted what could not have been proved, that he had descended from some African who had once been held in bondage, that therefore he was not, in view of the Constitution, a citizen of the United States, and therefore could not implead the reputed master in the Federal courts; and on this ground the Supreme Court were prepared to dismiss the action, for want of jurisdiction over the suitor's person. This decision, certainly as repugnant to the Declaration of Independence and to the spirit of the Constitution, as to the instincts of humanity, nevertheless would be one which would exhaust all the power of the tribunal, and exclude consideration of all other questions that had been raised upon the record. The counsel who had appeared for the negro had volunteered from motives of charity, and, ignorant of course of the disposition which was to be made of the cause, had argued that his client had been freed from slavery by operation of the Missouri prohibition of 1820. The opposing counsel, paid by the defending slaveholder, had insisted, in reply, that that famous statute was unconstitutional. The mock debate had been heard in the chamber of the court in the basement of the Capitol, in the presence of the curious visitors at the seat of Government, whom the dullness of a judicial investigation could not disgust. The court did not hesitate to please the incoming President, by seizing this extraneous and idle forensic discussion, and converting it into an occasion for pronouncing an opinion that the Missouri prohibition was void; and that, by force of the Constitution, slavery existed, with all the elements of property in man over man, in all the Territories of the United States, paramount to any popular sovereignty within the Territories, and even to the authority of Congress itself.

In this ill-omened act, the Supreme Court forgot its own dignity, which had always been maintained with just judicial jealousy. They forgot that the province of a court is simply "jus dicere" and not at all "jus dare." They forgot, also, that one "foul sentence does more harm than many foul examples; for the last do but corrupt the stream, while the former corrupteth the fountain." And they and the President alike forgot that judicial usurpation is more odious and intolerable than any other among the manifold practices of tyranny.

The day of inauguration came—the first one among all the celebrations of that great national pageant that was to be desecrated by a coalition between the executive and judicial departments to undermine the National Legislature and the liberties of the people. The President, attended by the usual lengthened procession, arrived and took his seat on the portico. The Supreme Court attended him there, in robes which yet exacted public reverence. The people, unaware of the import of the whisperings carried on between the President and the Chief Justice, and imbued with veneration for both, filled the avenues and gardens far away as the eye could reach. The President addressed them in words as bland as those which the worst of all the Roman Emperors pronounced when he assumed the purple. He announced (vaguely, indeed, but with self-satisfaction) the forthcoming extra-judicial exposition of the Constitution, and pledged his submission to it as authoritative and final. The Chief Justice and his associates remained silent. The Senate, too, were there—constitutional witnesses of the transfer of administration. They, too, were silent, although the promised usurpation was to subvert the authority over more than half of the empire which Congress had assumed contemporaneously with the birth of the nation, and had exercised without interruption for near seventy years. It cost the President, under the circumstances, little exercise of magnanimity now to promise to the people of Kansas, on whose neck he had, with the aid of the Supreme Court, hung the millstone of slavery, a fair trial in their attempt to cast it off, and hurl it to the earth, when they should come to organize a State government. Alas! that even this cheap promise, uttered under such great solemnities, was only made to be broken!

The pageant ended. On the 5th of March the judges, without even exchanging their silken robes for courtiers' gowns, paid their salutations to the President, in the Executive palace. Doubtlessly the President received them as graciously as Charles I. did the judges who had, at his instance, subverted the statutes of English liberty. On the 6th of March the Supreme Court dismissed the negro suitor, Dred Scott, to return to his bondage; and having thus disposed of that private action for an alleged private wrong, on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the case, they proceeded, with amusing solemnity, to pronounce the opinion that if they had had such jurisdiction, still the unfortunate negro would have had to remain in bondage, unrelieved, because the Missouri prohibition violates rights of general property involved in slavery, paramount to the authority of Congress. A few days later, copies of this opinion were multiplied by the Senate's press, and scattered in the name of the Senate broadcast over the land, and their publication has not yet been disowned by the Senate. Simultaneously, Dred Scott, who had played the hand of dumny in this interesting political game, unwittingly, yet to the complete satisfaction of his adversary, was voluntarily emancipated; and thus received from his master, as a reward, the freedom which the court had denied him as a right.

The new President of the United States, having organized this formidable judicial battery at the Capitol, was now ready to begin his active demonstrations of intervention in the Territory. Here occurred, not a new want, but an old one revived—a Governor for Kansas. Robert J. Walker, born and reared in Pennsylvania, a free State, but long a citizen and resident of Mississippi, a slave State, eminent for talent and industry, devoted to the President and his party, plausible and persevering, untiring and efficient, seemed just the man to conduct the fraudulent inchoate proceedings of the projected Lecompton convention to a conclusion, by dividing the friends of free labor in the Territory, or by casting upon them the responsibility of defeating their own favorite policy by impracticability and contu-macy. He wanted for this purpose only an army, and full command of the Executive exchequer, of promises of favor and of threats of punishment. Frederick P. Stanton, of Tennessee, honorable and capable, of persuasive address, but honest ambition, was appointed his Secretary. The new agents soon found they had assumed a task that would tax all their energies and require all their adroitness. On the one side, the slave-labor party were determined to circumvent the people, and secure, through the Lecompton convention, a slave State. On the other, the people were watchful, and determined not to be circumvented, and in no case to submit. Elections for delegates to that body were at hand. The Legislature had required a census and registry of voters to be made by authorities designated by itself, and this duty had been only partially performed in fifteen of the thirty-four counties, and altogether omitted in the other nineteen. The party of slave labor insisted on payment of taxes as a condition of suffrage. The free-labor party deemed the whole proceeding void, by reason of the usurpation practiced, and of the defective arrangements for the election. They discovered a design to surprise in the refusal of any guarantee that the constitution, when framed, should be submitted to the people, for their acceptance or rejection, preparatory to an application under it for the admission of Kansas into the Union. The Governor, drawing from the ample Treasury of the Executive at his command, made due exhibitions of the army, and threatened the people with an acceptance of the Lecompton constitution, however obnoxious to them, if they should refuse to vote. With these menaces, he judiciously mingled promises of fabulous quantities of land for the endowment of roads and education. He dispensed with the test oaths and taxes, lamented the defects of census and registry, and promised the rejection of the constitution by himself, by the President, and by Congress, if a full, fair, and complete submission of the constitution should not be made by the convention; and he obtained and published pledges of such submission by the party conventions which nominated the candidates for delegates, and even by an imposing number of the candidates themselves. The people stood aloof, and refused to vote. The army protected the polls. The slave-labor party alone voted, and voted without legal restraint, and so achieved an easy formal success by casting some two thousand ballots.

Just in this conjuncture, however, the term of three years' service which the usurping Legislature had fixed for its own members expired, and elections, authorized by itself, were to be held, for the choice, not only of new members, but of a Delegate to Congress. While the Lecompton convention was assembling, the free-labor party determined to attend these territorial elections, and contest, through them, for self-government within the Territory. They put candidates in nomination, on the express ground of repudiation of the whole Lecompton proceeding. The Lecompton convention prudently adjourned to a day beyond the elections. The parties contended at the ballot-boxes, and the result was a complete and conclusive triumph of the free-labor party. For a moment, this victory, so important, was jeopardized by the fraudulent presentation of spurious and fabricated returns of elections in almost uninhabited districts, sufficient to transfer the triumph to the slave-labor party, and the free-State party was proceeding to vindicate it by force. The Governor and Secretary detected, proved, and exposed, this atrocious fraud. The Lecompton convention denounced them, and complaints against them poured in upon the President, from the slaveholding States. They were doomed from that time. The President was silent. The Lecompton convention proceeded, and framed a constitution which declares slavery perpetual and irreversible, and postpones any alteration of its own provisions until after 1864, by which time they hoped that slavery might have gained too deep a hold in the soil of Kansas to be in danger of being uprooted. All this was easy; but now came the question whether the constitution should be submitted to the people. It was confessed that it was obnoxious to them, and, if submitted, would be rejected with indignation and contempt. An official emissary from Washington is supposed to have suggested the solution which was adopted. This was a submission in form, but not in fact. The president of the convention, without any laws to preserve the purity of the franchise by penalties for its violation, was authorized to designate his own agents, altogether irrespectively of the territorial authorities, and with their aid to hold an election, in which there should be no vote allowed or received, if against the constitution itself. Each voter was permitted to cast a ballot "for the constitution with slavery," or "for the constitution with no slavery;" and it was further provided that the constitution should stand entire, if a majority of votes should be cast for the constitution with slavery, while, on the other hand, if the majority of votes cast should be "for the constitution with no slavery," then the existing slavery should not be disturbed, but should remain, with its continuance, by the succession of its unhappy victims by descent forever. But even this miserable shadow of a choice between forms of a slave-State constitution was made to depend on the taking of a test oath to support and maintain it in the form which should be preferred by the majority of those who should vote on complying with that humiliation. The Governor saw that by conniving at this pitiful and wicked juggle he should both shipwreck his fame and become responsible for civil war. He remonstrated, and appealed to his chief, the President of the United States, to condemn it. Denunciations followed him from the Lecompton party within the Territory, and denunciations no less violent from the slave States were his greeting at the national capital. The President disappointed his most effective friend and wisest counselor. This present Congress had now assembled. The President, as if fearful of delay, forestalled our attention with recommendations to overlook the manifest objections to the transaction, and to regard the anticipated result of this mock election, then not yet held, as equivalent to an acceptance of the constitution by the people of Kansas, alleging that the refusal of the people to vote either the ballot for the "constitution with slavery," or the false and deceitful ballot for the "constitution with no slavery," would justly be regarded as drawing after it the consequences of actual acceptance and adoption of the constitution itself. His argument was apologetical, as it lamented that the constitution had not been fairly submitted; and jesuitical, as it urged that the people might, when once admitted as a State, change the constitution at their pleasure, in defiance of the provision which postpones any change seven years.

Copies of the message containing these arguments were transmitted to the Territory, to confound and dishearten the free-State party, and obtain a surrender, at the election to be held on the 21st of December, on the questions submitted by the convention. The people, however, were neither misled nor intimidated. Alarmed by this act of connivance by the President of the United States with their oppressors, they began to prepare for the last arbitrament of nations. The Secretary, Mr. Stanton, now Governor ad interim, issued his proclamation, calling the new Territorial Legislature to assemble to provide for preserving the public peace. An Executive spy dispatched information of this proceeding to the President by telegraph, and instantly Mr. Stanton ceased to be Secretary and Governor ad interim, being removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. Thus the service of Frederick P. Stanton came to an abrupt end; but in a manner most honorable to himself. His chief, Mr. Walker, was less wise and less fortunate. He resigned. Pæus Thrasæa (we are informed by Tacitus) had been often present in the Senate, when the fathers descended to unworthy acts, and did not rise in opposition; but on the occasion when Nero procured from them a decree to celebrate, as a festival, the day on which he had murdered his mother, Agrippina, Pæus left his seat, and walked out of the chamber—thus by his virtue provoking future vengeance, and yet doing no service to the cause of liberty. Possibly Robert J. Walker may find a less stern historian.

The new Secretary, Mr. Denver, became Governor of Kansas, the fifth incumbent of that office appointed within less than four years, the legal term of one. Happily, however, for the honor of the country, three of the recalls were made on the ground of the virtues of the parties disgraced.

The pro-consuls of the Roman provinces were brought back to the Capitol to answer for their crimes.

The proceeding which the late Secretary Stanton had so wisely instituted, nevertheless went on; and it has become, as I trust, the principal means of rescuing from tyranny the people whom he governed so briefly and yet so well. The Lecompton constitution had directed, that on the 4th of January elections should be held to fill the State offices and the offices of members of the Legislature and member of Congress, to assume their trusts when the new State should be admitted into the Union. The Legislature of the Territory now enacted salutary laws for preserving the purity of elections in all cases. It directed the Lecompton constitution to be submitted to a fair vote on that day, the ballots being made to express a consent to the constitution, or a rejection of it, with or without slavery. The free labor party debated anxiously on the question whether, besides voting against that constitution, they should, under protest, vote also for officers to assume the trusts created by it, if Congress should admit the State under it. After a majority had decided that no such votes should be cast, a minority hastily rejected the decision, and nominated candidates for those places, to be supported under protest. The success of the movement, made under the most serious disadvantages, is conclusive evidence of their strength. While the election held on the 21st of December, allowing all fraudulent votes, showed some six thousand majority for the constitution with slavery, over some five hundred votes for the constitution without slavery, the election on the 4th of January showed an aggregate majority of eleven thousand against the constitution itself in any form, with the choice, under protest, of a Representative in Congress, and of a large majority of all the candidates nominated by the free-labor party for the various executive and legislative trusts under the Lecompton constitution.

The Territorial Legislature has abolished slavery by a law to take effect in March, 1858, though the Lecompton constitution contains provisions anticipating, and designed to defeat, this great act of justice and humanity. It has organized a militia, which stands ready for the defense of the rights of the people against any power. The president of the Lecompton convention has fled the Territory, charged with an attempt to procure fraudulent returns to reverse the already declared results of the last election, and he holds the public in suspense as to his success until after his arrival at the capital, and the decision of Congress on the acceptance of the Lecompton constitution. In the mean time, the Territorial Legislature has called a convention, subject to the popular approval, to be held in this month, and to form a constitution to be submitted to the people, and, when adopted, to be the organic law of the new State of Kansas, subject to her admission into the Union. The President of the United States, having received the Lecompton constitution, has submitted it to Congress, and insisting that the vote taken on the juggle of the Lecompton convention, held on the 21st of December, is legally conclusive of its acceptance by the people, and absolute against the fair, direct, and unimpeachable rejection of it by that people, made on the 4th of January last, he recommends and urges and implores the admission of Kansas as a State into the Federal Union, under that false, pretended, and spurious constitution. I refrain from any examination of his extraordinary message. My recital is less complete than I have hoped, if it does not overthrow all the President's arguments in favor of the acceptance of the Lecompton constitution as an act of the people of Kansas, however specious, and without descending to any details. In Congress, those who seek the admission of Kansas under that constitution, strive to delay the admission of Minnesota until their opponents shall compromise on that paramount question.

This, Mr. President, is a concise account of the national intervention in the Territories in favor of slave labor and slave States since 1820. No wonder that the question before us excites apprehensions and alarm. There is at last a North side of this Chamber, a North side of the Chamber of Representatives, a North side of the Union, as well as South sides of all these. Each of them is watchful, jealous, and resolute. If it be true, as has so often been asserted, that this Union cannot survive the decision by Congress of a direct question involving the adoption of a free State which will establish the ascendancy of free States under the Constitution, and draw after it the restoration of the influence of freedom in the domestic and foreign conduct of the Government, then the day of dissolution is at hand.

I have thus, Mr. President, arrived at the third circumstance attending the Kansas question which I have thought worthy of consideration, namely, that the national intervention in the Territories in favor of slave labor and slave States is opposed to the material, moral, and social developments of the Republic. The proposition seems to involve a paradox; but it is easy to understand that the checks which the Constitution applies, through prudent caution, to the relative increase of the representation of the free States in the House of Representatives, and especially in the Senate, co-operating with the differences of temper and political activity between the two classes of States, may direct the Government of the Federal Union in one course, while the tendencies of the nation itself, popularly regarded, are in a direction exactly opposite.

The ease and success which attended the earlier policy of intervention in favor of free labor and free States, and the resistance which the converse policy of intervention in favor of slave labor and slave States encounters, sufficiently establish the existence of the antagonism between the Government and the nation which I have asserted. A vessel moves quietly and peacefully while it descends with the current. You mark its way by the foam on its track only when it is forced against the tide. I will not dwell on other proofs—such as the more rapid growth of the free States, the ruptures of ecclesiastical federal unions, and the demoralization and disorganization of political parties.

Mr. President, I have shown why it is that the Kansas question is attended by difficulties and dangers only by way of preparation for the submission of my opinions in regard to the manner in which that question ought to be determined and settled. I think, with great deference to the judgments of others, that the expedient, peaceful, and right way to determine it, is, to reverse the existing policy of intervention in favor of slave labor and slave States. It would be wise to restore the Missouri prohibition of slavery in Kansas and Nebraska. There was peace in the Territories and in the States until that great statute of freedom was subverted. It is true that there were frequent debates here on the subject of slavery; and that there were profound sympathies among the people, awakened by, or responding to, those debates. But what was Congress instituted for but debate? What makes the American people to differ from all other nations, but this: that while among them power enforces silence, here all public questions are referred to debate—free debate in Congress. Do you tell me that the Supreme Court of the United States has removed the foundations of that great statute? I reply that they have done no such thing; they could not do it. They have remanded the negro man Dred Scott to the custody of his master. With that decree we have nothing here, at least nothing now, to do. This is the extent of the judgment rendered, the extent of any judgment they could render. Already the pretended further decision is subverted in Kansas. So it will be in every free State and in every free Territory of the United States. The Supreme Court, also, can reverse its spurious judgment more easily than we could reconcile the people to its usurpation. Sir, the Supreme Court of the United States attempts to command the people of the United States to accept the principles that one man can own other men; and that they must guaranty the inviolability of that false and pernicious property. The people of the United States never can, and they never will, accept principles so unconstitutional and so abhorrent. Never, never. Let the court recede. Whether it recedes or not, we shall reorganize the court, and thus reform its political sentiments and practices, and bring them into harmony with the Constitution and with the laws of nature. In doing so, we shall not only reassume our own just authority, but we shall restore that high tribunal itself to the position it ought to maintain, since so many invaluable rights of citizens, and even of States themselves, depend upon its impartiality and its wisdom.

Do you tell me that the slave States will not acquiesce, but will agitate? Think first whether the free States will acquiesce in a decision that shall not only be unjust, but fraudulent. True, they will not menace the Republic. They have an easy and simple remedy, namely, to take the Government out of unjust and unfaithful hands, and commit it to those which will be just and faithful. They are ready to do this now. They want only a little more harmony of purpose and a little more completeness of organization. These will result from only the least addition to the pressure of slavery upon them. You are lending all that is necessary, and even more, in this very act. But will the slave States agitate? Why? Because they have lost at last a battle that they could not win, unwisely provoked, fought with all the advantages of strategy and intervention, and on a field chosen by themselves. What would they gain? Can they compel Kansas to adopt slavery against her will? Would it be reasonable or just to do it, if they could? Was negro servitude ever forced by the sword on any people that inherited the blood which circulates in our veins, and the sentiments which make us a free people? If they will agitate on such a ground as this, then how, or when, by what concessions we can make, will they ever be satisfied? To what end would they agitate? It can now be only to divide the Union. Will they not need some fairer or more plausible excuse for a proposition so desperate? How would they improve their condition by drawing down a certain ruin upon themselves? Would they gain any new security for slavery? Would they not hazard securities that are invaluable? Sir, they who talk so idly, talk what they do not know themselves. No man, when cool, can promise what he will do when he shall be inflamed; no man inflamed can speak for his actions when time and necessity shall bring reflection. Much less can any one speak for States in such emergencies.

But, I shall not insist, now, on so radical a measure as the restoration of the Missouri prohibition. I know how difficult it is for power to relinquish even a pernicious and suicidal policy all at once. We may attain the same result, in this particular case of Kansas, without going back so far. Go back only to the ground assumed in 1854, the ground of popular sovereignty. Happily for the authors of that measure, the zealous and energetic resistance of abuses practiced under it has so far been effective that popular sovereignty in Kansas may now be made a fact, and liberty there may be rescued from danger through its free exercise. Popular sovereignty is an epic of two parts. Part the first presents freedom in Kansas lost. Part the second, if you will so consent to write it, shall be freedom in Kansas regained. It is on this ground that I hail the eminent Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and his associates, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and the youthful, but most brave Senator from California, [Mr. BRODERICK.] The late Mr. Clay told us that Providence has many ways for saving nations. God forbid that I should consent to see freedom wounded, because my own lead, or even my own agency in saving it, should be rejected. I will cheerfully coöperate with these new defenders of this sacred cause in Kansas, and I will award them all due praise, when we shall have been successful, for their large share of merit in its deliverance.

Will you tell me that it is difficult to induce the Senate and the House of Representatives to take that short backward step? On the contrary, the hardest task that an executive dictator ever set, or parliamentary manager ever undertook, is to prevent this very step from being taken. Let the President take off his hand, and the bow, bent so long, and held to its tension by so hard a pressure, will relax, and straighten itself at once.

Consider now, if you please, the consequences of your refusal. If you attempt to coerce Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, the people of that Territory will resort to civil war. You are pledged to put down that revolution by the sword. Will the people listen to your voice amid the thunders of your cannon? Let but one drop of the blood of a free citizen be shed there, by the Federal Army, and the countenance of every Representative of a free State, in either House of Congress, will blanch, and his tongue will refuse to utter the vote necessary to sustain the Army in the butchery of his fellow-citizens.

Practically, you have already one intestine and territorial war—a war against Brigham Young in Utah. Can you carry on two, and confine the strife within the Territories? Can you win both? A wise nation will never provoke more than one enemy at one time. I know that you argue that the free-State men of Kansas are impracticable, factious, seditious? Answer me three questions: Are they not a majority, and so proclaimed by the people of Kansas? Is not this quarrel, for the right of governing themselves, conceded by the Federal Constitution? Is the tyranny of forcing a hateful government upon them, less intolerable than three cents impost on a pound of tea, or five cents stamp duty on a promissory note? You say that they can change this Lecompton constitution when it shall once have been forced upon them. Let it be abandoned now. What guarantee can you give against your own intervention to prevent that future change? What security can you give for your own adherence to the construction of the constitution which you adopt, from expediency, to-day? What better is a constitution than a by-law of a corporation, if it may be forced on a State to-day, and rejected to-morrow, in derogation of its own express inhibition?

I perceive, Mr. President, that, in the way of argument, I have passed already from the ground of expediency on which I was standing, to that of right and justice. Among all our refinements of constitutional learning, one principle, one fundamental principle, has been faithfully preserved, namely: That the new States must come voluntarily into the Union; they must not be forced into it. "Unite or Die," was the motto addressed to the States in the time of the Revolution. Though Kansas should perish, she cannot be brought into the Union by force.

So long as the States shall come in by free consent, their admission will be an act of union, and this will be a confederacy. Whenever they shall be brought in by fraud or force, their admission will be an act of consolidation, and the nation, ceasing to be a confederacy, will become in reality an empire. All our elementary instruction is wrong; or else this change of the Constitution will subvert the liberties of the American people.

You argue the consent of Kansas from documentary proofs, from her forced and partial acquiescence under your tyrannical rule, from elections fraudulently conducted, from her own contumacy, and from your own records, made up here against her. I answer the whole argument at once: Kansas protests here, and stands, by your own confession, in an attitude of rebellion at home, to resist the annexation which you contend she is soliciting at your hands.

Sir, if your proofs were a thousand times stronger, I would not hold the people of Kansas bound by them. They all are contradicted by stern fact. A people can be bound by no action conducted in their name, and pretending to their sanction, unless they enjoy perfect freedom and safety in giving that consent. You have held the people of Kansas in duress from the first hour of their attempted organization as a community. To crown this duress by an act, at once forcing slavery on them, which they hate, and them into a union with you, on terms which they abhor, would be but to illustrate anew, and on a grand scale, the maxim—

"Prosperum est felix scelus, virtus vocatur."

Mr. President, it is an occasion for joy and triumph, when a community that has gathered itself together under circumstances of privation and exile, and proceeded through a season of territorial or provincial dependence on distant central authority, becomes a State, in the full enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, and rises into the dignity of a member of this imperial Union. But, in the case of Kansas, her whole existence has been, and it yet is, a trial, a tempest, a chaos—and now you propose to make her nuptials a celebration of the funeral of her freedom. The people of Kansas are entitled to save that freedom, for they have won it back when it had been wrested from them by invasion and usurpation. Sir, you are great and strong. On this continent there is no Power can resist you. On any other, there is hardly a Power that would not reluctantly engage with you—but you can never, never conquer Kansas. Your power, like a throne which is built of pine boards, and covered with purple, is weakness, except it be defended by a people confiding in you, because satisfied that you are just, and grateful for the freedom that, under you, they enjoy.

Sir, in view once more of this subject of slavery, I submit that our own dignity requires that we shall give over this champerty with slaveholders, which we practice in prescribing acquiescence in their rule as a condition of toleration of self-government in the Territories. We are defeated in it. We may wisely give it up, and admit Kansas as a free State, since she will consent to be admitted only in that character.

Mr. President, if I could at all suppose it desirable or expedient to enlarge the field of slave labor, and of slaveholding sway in this Republic, I should nevertheless maintain that it is wise to relinquish the effort to sustain slavery in Kansas. The question, in regard to that Territory, has risen from a private one about slavery as a domestic institution, to one of slavery as a national policy. A every step you have been failing. Will you go on still further, ever confident, and yet ever unsuccessful?

I believe, sir, to some extent, in the isothermal theory. I think there are regions, beginning at the north pole, and stretching southward, where slavery will die out soon, if it be planted; and I know, too well, that in the tropics, and to some extent northward of them, slavery lives long, and is hard to extirpate. But I cannot find a certain boundary. I am sure, however, that 36° 30' is too far north. I think it is a movable boundary, and that every year it advances towards a more southern parallel.

But is there just now a real want of a new State for the employment of slave labor? I see and feel the need of room for a new State to be assigned to free labor, of room for such a new State almost every year. I think I see how it arises. Free white men abound in this country, and in Europe, and even in Asia. Economically speaking, their labor is cheap—there is a surplus of it. Under improved conditions of society, life grows longer, and men multiply faster. Wars, which sometimes waste them, grow less frequent and less destructive. Invention is continually producing machines and engines, artificial laborers, crowding them from one field of industry to another—ever more from the eastern regions of this continent to the west; ever more from the overcrowded eastern continent to the prairies and the wildernesses in our own. But I do not see any such overflowing of the African slave population in this country, even where it is unresisted. Free labor has been obstructed in Kansas. There are, nevertheless, fifty or sixty thousand freemen gathered there already; gathered there within four years. Slave labor has been free to importation. There are only one or two hundred slaves there. To settle and occupy a new slave State anywhere is, pari passu, to depopulate old slave States. Whence, then, are the supplies of slaves to come, and how? Only by reviving the African slave trade. But this is forbidden. Visionaries dream that the prohibition can be repealed. The idea is insane. A Republic of thirty millions of freemen, with a free white laboring population so dense as already to crowd on subsistence, to be brought to import negroes from Africa to supplant them as cultivators, and so to subject themselves to starvation! Though Africa is yet unorganized, and unable to protect itself, still it has already exchanged, in a large degree, its wars to make slaves and its commerce in slaves for legitimate agriculture and trade. All European States are interested in the civilization of that continent, and they will not consent that we shall arrest it. The Christian church cannot be forced back two centuries, and be made to sanction the African slave trade as a missionary enterprise.

Every nation has always some ruling idea, which, however, changes with the several stages of its development. A ruling idea of the colonies on this continent, two hundred years ago, was, labor to subdue and reclaim nature. Then African slavery was seized and employed as an auxiliary, under a seeming necessity. That idea has ceased forever. It has given place to a new one. Aggrandizement of the nation, not, indeed, as it once was, to make a small State great, but to make a State already great the greatest of all States. It still demands labor, but it is no longer the ignorant labor of barbarians, but labor perfected by knowledge and skill, and combination with all the scientific principles of mechanism. It demands, not the labor of slaves, which needs to be watched and defended, but voluntary, enlightened labor, stimulated by interest, affection, and ambition. It needs that every man shall own the land he tills; that every head shall be fit for the helmet, and every hand fit for the sword, and every mind ready and qualified for counsel. To attempt to aggrandize a country with slaves for its inhabitants, would be to try to make a large body of empire with feeble sinews and empty veins.

Mr. President, the expansion of territory to make slave States will only fail to be a great crime because it is impracticable; and, therefore, will turn out to be a stupendous imbecility. A free republican Government like this, notwithstanding all its constitutional checks, cannot long resist and counteract the progress of society. Slavery, wherever and whenever, and in whatsoever form it exists, is exceptional, local, and short-lived. Freedom is the common right, interest, and ultimate destiny, of all mankind. All other nations have already abolished, or are about abolishing, slavery. Does this fact mean nothing? All parties in this country that have tolerated the extension of slavery, except one, have perished for that error already. That last one—the Democratic party—is hurrying on irretrievably toward the same fate. All administrations that have avowed this policy have gone down dishonored for that cause, except the present one. A pit deeper and darker still is opening to receive this Administration, because it sins more deeply than its predecessors. There is a meaning in all these facts, which it becomes us to study well. The nation has advanced another stage; it has reached the point where intervention by the Government for slavery and slave States will no longer be tolerated. Free labor has at last apprehended its rights, its interests, its power, and its destiny; and is organizing itself to assume the government of the Republic. It will henceforth meet you boldly and resolutely here; it will meet you everywhere—in the Territories or out of them—wherever you may go to extend slavery. It has driven you back in California and in Kansas; it will invade you soon in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Missouri, and Texas. It will meet you in Arizona, in Central America, and even in Cuba. The invasion will be not merely harmless, but beneficent, if you yield seasonably to its just and moderated demands. It proved so in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the other slave States which have already yielded in that way to its advances. You may, indeed, get a start under or near the tropics, and seem safe for a time, but it will be only a short time. Even there you will find States only for free labor to maintain and occupy. The interest of the white races demands the ultimate emancipation of all men. Whether that consummation shall be allowed to take effect, with needful and wise precautions against sudden change and disaster, or be hurried on by violence, is all that remains for you to decide. For the failure of your system of slave labor throughout the Republic, the responsibility will rest, not on the agitators you condemn, or on the political parties you arraign, or even altogether on yourselves, but it will be due to the inherent error of the system itself, and to the error which thrusts it forward to oppose and resist the destiny not more of the African than that of the white races. The white man needs this continent to labor upon. His head is clear, his arm is strong, and his necessities are fixed. He must and will have it. To secure it, he will oblige the Government of the United States to abandon intervention in favor of slave labor and slave States, and go backward forty years and resume the original policy of intervention in favor of free labor and free States. The fall of the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa determined the fate of Mexico, although sore sieges and severe pitched battles intervened before the capture of the capital of the Aztecs. The defeats you have encountered in California and in Kansas determine the fate of the principle for which you have been contending. It is for yourselves, not for us, to decide how long and through what further mortifications and disasters the contest shall be protracted, before freedom shall enjoy her already assured triumph. I would have it ended now, and would have the wounds of society bound up and healed. But this can be done only in one way. It cannot be done by offering further resistance, nor by any evasion or partial surrender, nor by forcing Kansas into the Union as a slave State, against her will, leaving her to cast off slavery afterwards, as she best may; nor by compelling Minnesota and Oregon to wait, and wear the humiliating costume of Territories at the doors of Congress, until the people of Kansas, or their true defenders here, shall be brought to dishonorable compromises. It can be done only by the simple and direct admission of the three new States as free States, without qualification, condition, reservation, or compromise, and by the abandonment of all further attempts to extend slavery under the Federal Constitution. You have unwisely pushed the controversy so far, that only these broad concessions will now be accepted by the interest of free labor and free States. For myself, I see this fact perhaps the more distinctly now, because I have so long foreseen it. I can therefore counsel nothing less than those concessions. I know the hazards I incur in taking this position. I know how men and parties, now earnest and zealous, and bold, may yet fall away from me, as the controversy shall wax warm, and alarms and dangers, now unlooked for, shall stare them in the face, as men and parties, equally earnest, bold, and zealous, have done, in like circumstances, before. But it is the same position I took in the case of California, eight years ago. It is the same I maintained on the great occasion of the organization of Kansas and Nebraska, four years ago. Time and added experience have vindicated it since; and I assume it again, to be maintained to the last, with confidence that it will be justified, ultimately, by the country and by the civilized world. You may refuse to yield it now, and for a short period; but your refusal will only animate the friends of freedom with the courage and the resolution, and produce the union among them, which alone are necessary, on their part, to attain the position itself simultaneously with the impending overthrow of the existing Federal Administration and the constitution of a new and more independent Congress.

Mr. President, this expansion of the empire of free white men is to be conducted through the process of admitting new States, and not otherwise. The white man, whether you consent or not, will make the States to be admitted, and he will make them all free States. We must admit them, and admit them all free; otherwise, they will become independent and foreign States, constituting a new empire to contend with us for the continent. To admit them is a simple, easy, and natural policy. It is not new to us, or to our times. It began with the voluntary union of the first thirteen. It has continued to go on, overriding all resistance, ever since. It will go on until the ends of the continent are the borders of our Union. Thus we become collaborators with our fathers, and even with our posterity throughout many ages. After times, contemplating the whole vast structure, completed and perfected, will forget the dates, and the eras, and the individualities of the builders in their successive generations. It will be one great Republic, founded by one body of benefactors. I wonder that the President of the United States undervalues the Kansas question, when it is a part of a transaction so immense and sublime. Far from sympathizing with him in his desire to depreciate it, and to be rid of it, I felicitate myself on my humble relation to it; for I know that Heaven cannot grant, nor man desire, a more favorable occasion to acquire fame, than he enjoys who is engaged in laying the foundations of a great empire; and I know, also, that while mankind have often deified their benefactors, no nation has ever yet bestowed honors on the memories of the founders of slavery.

I have always believed, Mr. President, that this glorious Federal Constitution of ours is adapted to the inevitable expansion of the empire which I have so feebly presented. It has been perverted often by misconstruction, and it has yet to be perverted many times, and widely, hereafter; but it has inherent strength and vigor that will cast off all the webs which the ever-changing interests of classes may weave around it. If it fail us now, it will, however, not be our fault, but because an inevitable crisis, like that of youth, or of manhood, is to be encountered by a constitution proved in that case to be inadequate to the trial. I am sure that no patriot, who views the subject as I do, could wish to evade or delay the trial. By delay we could only extend slavery, at the most, throughout the Atlantic region of the continent. The Pacific slope is free, and it always must and will be free. The mountain barriers that separate us from that portion of our empire are quite enough to alienate us too widely, possibly to divide us too soon. Let us only become all slaveholding States on this side of those barriers, while only free States are organized and perpetuated on the other side, and then indeed there will come a division of the great American family into two nations, equally ambitious for complete control over the continent, and a conflict between them, over which the world will mourn, as the greatest and last to be retrieved of all the calamities that have ever befallen the human race.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill for the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, and I shall ask permission, very briefly, to state some of the reasons which induce me to do so.

I am aware, sir, that this subject has been so fully discussed in this Chamber that nothing new can be added to it by any one, least of all by me; and I therefore owe an apology in advance to the Senate for repeating, as I shall be obliged to do, what has been said before so much better than I can possibly hope to do. But the section of the Union from which I come, with the views I entertain, render it proper, if not necessary, that I should ask your indulgence for a few minutes.

For the last four years our country has been kept in a state of fearful excitement by the agitation of a question which has threatened the existence of our Union, and, if much longer continued, must at no distant day inevitably dissolve it.

An opportunity, in my opinion, is now presented to settle it—an opportunity by which this question, which can never be discussed with profit or safety in Congress, may be removed forever from its Halls.

An opportunity is now presented to localize an institution within the limits of the States which are interested in it, and to carry out the great principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act of "non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories." Shall we embrace the opportunity thus presented, or shall we, by neglecting it, put in peril, as we will do, the peace, if not the existence, of the Union?

A Territory of the United States asks admission as a State into the Union, and presents to you a constitution in every respect—in form and in substance—legal and republican; a constitution framed and put into operation in precisely the same manner as ten out of the new States of the Union; a constitution whose validity is recognized by the acts of the people, and substantially ratified by their election, under its provisions, of a member of Congress to represent them in your House of Representatives, a Governor, and members of the State Legislature.

But, notwithstanding this perfect conformity with law and usage, this application is resisted on the ground of its constitution not being in accordance with the will of the people, and its not having been submitted as a whole to them for ratification or rejection.

Now, Mr. President, from the great stress which has been laid in certain quarters upon the necessity of such a submission, one would be apt to suppose that such had always heretofore been the rule as a prerequisite to the admission of a State into the Union; and that the case of Kansas, in which the whole constitution was not submitted to the people, was a fatal exception to that rule, and on that account should be rejected by Congress.

But in the investigation which I have made into the history of the formation of the constitutions of the different States of the Union, I have arrived at a very different result; and am satisfied that, so far from submission being a rule, it has been a marked exception to it. Now, although I do most heartily approve of the submission to the people of a State of all great questions affecting their interests, not only their forms of government, but also legislative acts involving the creation of debt and the faith of the State, yet, sir, the submission of a constitution, after having been framed by a convention of delegates duly elected for that purpose, has certainly not been considered necessary by a large number, if not by a majority of the States of this Union. If the people desire to act directly by their votes upon the adoption of a constitution, they have the undoubted right to do so. But they have an equal right to delegate their power to a convention to act for them, and to make and put in operation a constitution without submitting it to them for their further action.

And if it be true, as has recently been said, that a submission to the people, and their adoption of a constitution, is necessary to give it validity, then, upon the same principle, legislative acts should in like manner be submitted before taking effect; for the people are more interested in, and frequently more seriously injured by, bad laws than by bad constitutions.

I have said that a large number, if not a majority, of the States of the Union, have not considered this submission as at all necessary. The constitutions, now in force, of the following named States, were not submitted for ratification to the people, but adopted in convention.

Connecticut, by convention, in 1818. (See Compilation of Statutes of Connecticut, 1854, pages 29 and 45.)

Delaware, by convention, in 1831. (See Acts of 1831, page 49; and Revised Code, page 43.)

Pennsylvania, by convention, in 1838, with a provision for future amendments to be ratified by the people. (See Purdon's Digest, page 17, section 10.)

North Carolina adopted her present constitution in 1776, by convention; amendments in 1835.

South Carolina, in 1790, by convention.

Georgia, by convention, on the 23d of May, 1798.

Alabama, in 1819, by convention under enabling act. (See Code of Alabama, page 26, section 5, page 28.)

Mississippi, by convention, in 1817; and revised in like manner in 1832.

Tennessee, by convention, in 1836.

Kentucky, by convention, in 1799.

Arkansas, by convention, without enabling act. (See Revised Statutes of Arkansas, pages 17-48.)

Missouri, by convention, in 1820; and not submitted to the people.

Illinois, by convention, in 1818; also appears not to have been submitted to the people.

The following were compelled by statute to submit the constitutions framed by the conventions to the people:

New York, constitution adopted in 1846. Section 9, act of 1845, providing for the convention, required its ratification by the people.

New Jersey, act of 1844, approved February 23. Section nine required its submission to the people. It was submitted and ratified in 1844.

Maryland, formed in 1851, and ratified by the people, in accordance with previous act of Legislature. (See Acts of 1849, chapter 346, section 8.)

Virginia, formed in 1851. Act of March 13, 1851, required its ratification by the people.

Indiana, formed in 1851, ratified by the people, as required by the law authorizing the convention. (See act of 1850, approved January 18, sections 14 and 15.) The section relative to the exclusion and colonization of negroes was submitted as a distinct proposition. (See Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 72.)

Wisconsin, 1848. Section nine of schedule required its ratification by the people. (Revised Statutes, 1849.) In April, 1847, the constitution was defeated by over seven thousand majority. (Niles's Register, volume 72, page 114.) A new constitution was then formed, and the State admitted under it May 29, 1848.

Iowa, formed in 1846. Previous laws of June 10, 1845, (over the veto of the Governor,) and of January 17, 1846, required ratification by the people.

Ohio, the first constitution, formed under an enabling act of Congress, adopted 29th October, 1802, was not submitted to the people; that of the 10th March, 1857, was submitted to the people and approved by them.

Louisiana, formed 1852. The constitution was, by previous enactment, required to be submitted, and was ratified by the people.

Michigan, formed 1850. Act of March 9, 1850, required it to be submitted to the people. (See Laws of 1850, No. 78, section 6, on page 66.)

Maine, formed in 1819, by convention, (page 432 Hickey's Constitution;) amendments submitted to the people 1834, 1837, 1839.

New Hampshire, formed 1792. (See Compiled Statutes, page 15.) Approved by the two-third vote of the people, and established by convention September 5, 1792.

Rhode Island, formed 1842. Ratified by vote of the people in pursuance of act of the Legislature.

Massachusetts, formed 1780. Convention adjourned till constitution was ratified by two-third vote.

Texas, formed 1845. Submitted to and ratified by the people.

The constitutions of the following States were submitted by conventions to the people, without their being required by law to do so:

Florida, formed in 1838. Territorial act of 1838 (see act of 1838, page 5) did not require the ratification of the constitution by the people. There was no authority of Congress. The convention (see Digest of Laws of Florida, page 9) required ratification by the people.

California, formed in 1849. Convention required the ratification of the constitution by the people. There was no authority of Congress or legislative act to frame a constitution. (See Statutes of California, page 24, sections 5, 6, and 7.)

From this statement it will be seen, sir, that in fourteen States constitutions were formed by conventions, and went into operation without any submission whatever to the people.

In fifteen States conventions, in obedience to the law convening them, directed the submission of their constitutions to the people; and in only two States, viz., Florida and California, conventions submitted their constitutions to the people, without being required by law to do so.

But, considering the very peculiar circumstances attending the formation of the constitutions and State governments of these States, Florida and California, they can hardly be regarded as exceptions to the rule and practice of conventions, viz., submitting constitutions only when they were expressly required by law to do so.

In the case of Florida the constitution was submitted to Congress February 20, 1839, and it was not admitted as a State until March 3, 1845. This delay was occasioned by the great diversity of opinion which existed in the Territory, as to whether application should be made at that time for the admission of the Territory as a State, or to postpone the application until their population would authorize them to ask admission for two States, East and West Florida, into the Union. It was this difference of opinion, as appears from the proceedings of Congress from 1839 to 1845, which postponed its admission for so long a time. The submission of the constitution to the people was not intended merely (if at all) for the purpose of securing their ratification of its provisions; but for the purpose of ascertaining whether they desired, at that time, to make application, under the constitution submitted to them, for admission into the Union. The vote on this question was very nearly equal. The difference between Florida and Kansas, in this respect, is a very marked one. In Kansas the sense of the people as to whether they desired admission into the Union, was taken before the assembling of the convention, and in Florida, in a different form, after it had framed a constitution.

And with regard to California the same necessity of submission existed in an equal, if not greater degree. At the time of the formation of the constitution of that State, California was not an organized Territory of the United States, but a conquered country, under military government. The convention of delegates to frame a constitution was called not by any legal or any duly authorized body, but by order of the military governor. And under such circumstances it became an indispensable necessity, that a constitution, so framed, should be ratified by the people, in order to impart validity to it. Congress could not otherwise be expected to entertain their application for admission.

In the case of Kansas, also, it must be observed, that so far from the convention being instructed by the Legislature to submit the constitution they might frame to the people for their sanction, the very reverse may fairly be inferred from the fact that the act "to provide for the election of delegates to the convention" was vetoed by Governor Geary, because, as he says in his message returning the bill, "it failed to make any provision to submit the constitution, when framed, to the consideration of the people for their ratification or rejection." And yet, sir, the act was passed over this veto, by a two-third vote. Certainly then, after this expression of the Legislature of Kansas, and the long line of precedents to which it might refer, the convention might fairly consider itself justified in submitting or not submitting the constitution to the people, as in its judgment at the time might be considered most expedient. From these facts is not, I ask, the inference plain and irresistible, that when the people, speaking through their representatives, desire such a submission, they provide for it, and that when they do not provide for it, a convention may consider it unnecessary for it to do what the law which called it into being did not require or expect it to do. It cannot be said in any case where this was not required, that it was an oversight. That would be doing great injustice to the Legislatures of the States, and to the learned men who participated in the formation of their several constitutions.

Again, sir, I will ask the attention of the Senate to the "joint resolutions of Congress for annexing Texas to the United States," approved March 1, 1845, for the purpose of showing the opinion entertained by that body of this question of submission. This "joint resolution" declares that—

"Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightfully belonging to, the Republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said Republic, by deputies in convention assembled; with the consent of the existing government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union."

Not one word is here said about submission to the people, notwithstanding there was at that time probably as much difference of opinion, on some subjects, in that Republic, as now exists in Kansas on others.

Again: in the resolution providing for the admission of the State of Missouri, "on a certain condition," approved March 2, 1821, such a submission was not deemed necessary. This condition was accepted, not by the people of Missouri, but by the Legislature of the State, by a solemn public act, declaring the assent of this State to the "fundamental condition contained in the resolution of Congress," and approved June 26, 1821. This act of the Legislature, accepting the "fundamental condition," which then became a part of the constitution of the State, was deemed an acceptance by the State; and the President of the United States, on the 10th of August, 1821, issued his proclamation, declaring the admission of Missouri complete, according to law, and it became one of the States of the Union.

We have now seen that an equal number of the States of the Union, the Congress of the United States, and the President, Mr. Monroe, have not regarded submission of a constitution to the people for their approval, as necessary to give it validity. Let me now ask attention to the action of the territorial committee of this body and the Senate on this very question. The distinguished Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] on the 25th of June, 1856, submitted to the Senate a bill for the admission of Kansas as a State; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglass] was chairman. The third section of this bill contained the following provision:

"That the propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted by the convention, and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory upon the United States and the said State of Kansas."

But, sir, when this bill, known as the "Toombs bill," was reported back to the Senate, the words "and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution," were stricken out, and the bill as amended passed the Senate, every Democratic member present voting for it except one.

And, Mr. President, in view of these facts, may I not say that, if the convention of Kansas did err in the respect of not submitting their whole constitution for popular approval, it has, nevertheless, done more to propitiate the spirit of popular sovereignty, by submitting an important provision in it, than fourteen States of the Union, whose constitutions, in whole or in part, have never received, by vote, the sanction of the people; and I submit that its rejection on that account at this day would be most cruel and unjust.

If misguided men in Kansas neglected the opportunity presented by such a submission to exhibit their majority, and, by their refusing to vote, gave an easy victory to their opponents, (by which an obnoxious provision in the constitution has been retained in it, which they might have stricken out,) they have no one to complain of but themselves, and the bad advisers who directed and controlled their action.

The Territorial Legislature afforded them, in the first instance, an opportunity, if they were a majority, as they claim to be, to elect delegates, who would have represented their views, not only on the slavery, but on all other questions in the convention; and the convention afterwards gave these an opportunity of striking from the constitution it had framed the only provision on which any difference of opinion existed in the Territory; yet, neglecting both opportunities, these men, or rather this party, now complain of injustice and wrong having been done them in the formation and adoption of the constitution, and insist upon its rejection. Appearing upon the record, in all the votes cast for delegates to the convention, and afterwards in the vote on the constitution, as a minority, they still insist that they are a large majority of the people of the Territory, and have been defrauded of their rights by a small minority.

And, sir, if it be true that the free-State party, as it is called, with a majority of three to one, as compared to the so-called pro-slavery party, suffered itself to be oppressed, wronged, and down-trodden by so small a minority, they, sir, are not entitled to our sympathy for their sufferings, but, on the contrary, deserve our contempt for their cowardice and imbecility. They claim to be a large majority, and it may be true; but there is no evidence of it in any election returns with which Congress can have any concern. They refuse to give the proof of this in the only way in which it can be given—by their votes—and then modestly ask us to take their word for it that they are a very large majority, and that the constitution framed at Lecompton is not in accordance with their will.

In the election for delegates to the convention, and the vote on the slavery clause of the constitution, the majority was very large against this party. No doubt it was so very large because in a factious spirit, they refused to vote on these occasions. But this was their own act, and they have no right to ask Congress to give them relief from the consequences of their own misconduct, by setting aside the elections in which they refused to participate. Congress can only judge of the result of an election by votes delivered, and not by votes withheld.

In this case, it seems to me that the only questions which Congress can properly consider (with reference to its admission) are not, whether every man in the Territory voted or not, nor into every irregularity which occurred in the elections; nor whether more frauds were committed by one party or the other party in the Territory, in their local elections. With these things Congress has nothing to do. But they may inquire into the legality of the body which framed the constitution, and as to the vote by which the constitution, or that part submitted to the people, was adopted. And in regard to the legality of the one, and the fairness of the other, there ought to be no dispute.

The Territorial Legislature, elected by the people, recognized by Congress, by the President and late President of the United States, by all the Governors of the Territory, including Governor Walker, were fully authorized in assembling a convention to frame a constitution, preparatory to its application for admission as a State into the Union. The sense of the people of the Territory had been taken as to whether they desired to be admitted into the Union, and a large majority were in favor of it. The Territorial Legislature then, in conformity with their wishes thus expressed, passed an act providing for the election of delegates to a convention to frame a constitution. The legality of this act is fully maintained by Governor Walker. He says:

"The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress; and the authority of the convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States. Those who oppose this course cannot aver the alleged irregularity of the Territorial Legislature, whose laws in town and city elections, in corporate franchises, and on all other subjects but slavery, they acknowledge by their votes and acquiescence. If that Legislature was invalid, then are we without law or order in Kansas; without town, city, or county organization; all legal and judicial transactions are void; all titles null; and anarchy reigns throughout our borders."

The whole people are then invited and urged to vote for their delegates.

Mr. Stanton, in his address of the 17th of April, 1857, says:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to frame a constitution, with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention."

And Governor Walker, on the 27th of May, in his inaugural address, says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution, to participate freely, and fairly, in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government."

And in the same address he warns them of the consequences which may result from their refusal to exercise the right of suffrage. He says:

"You should not console yourself with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution." * * * "Why incur the hazard of the preliminary formation of a constitution, by a minority, as alleged by you, when a majority, by their own votes, could control the framing of that instrument?"

But notwithstanding these invitations, appeals, and solemn warnings, a portion claiming to be a majority of the people refused to take part in the election, and thus suffered a minority to elect their delegates and frame a constitution in accordance with their own views.

The convention of delegates then, thus fairly elected, met and framed a constitution; and among its provisions is to be found one recognizing the institution of domestic slavery within the State. All the disturbances in Kansas, from the establishment of the territorial government, had their origin in this distracting and dangerous subject; and as it was a provision of paramount importance, the convention submitted it to the people for them to determine whether it should be retained in the constitution or stricken out. The question was thus ordered by the convention to be submitted to the people to be decided by their votes: "constitution with slavery," or "constitution without slavery." At the time and places ordered, polls were opened and the votes were received on this single question.

The convention was not bound, as I have before stated, by the act of the Territorial Legislature to submit the whole or any part of the constitution for ratification; but they did submit that part of it which related to this question, and the factious and revolutionary party, in like manner as they refused to vote for delegates to the convention, refused to vote upon this submission. It was accordingly retained, and is now a part of the organic law of Kansas as presented to Congress.

It seems to me, sir, that these people, being in a state of rebellion against the territorial government and the United States, were determined to resist from the beginning everything tending to a quiet settlement of the disturbances in the Territory, and the organization of a State government; and that I may do no injustice to them, I ask leave to insert what Governor Walker says to them in his proclamation of the 15th of July:

"You have, however, chosen to disregard the laws of Congress, and of the territorial government created by it; and whilst professing to acknowledge a State government rejected by Congress, and which can, therefore, now exist only by a successful rebellion, and exact from all your officers the perilous and sacrilegious oath to support the so-called State constitution; yet you have, even in defiance of the so-called State Legislature, which refused to grant you a charter, proceeded to create a local government of your own, based only upon insurrection and revolution. The very oath which you require from all your officers, to support your so-called Topeka State constitution, is violated in the very act of putting in operation a charter rejected even by them.

"A rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country."

And I will here express a strong doubt, judging from the turbulent and rebellious character of these men, whether, if the whole constitution had been submitted to them, and had been rejected, they would have called a convention to make another one. I think it extremely doubtful. Pretending, as they do, to regard the Topeka constitution as a valid one, they would adhere to it. For the sake of consistency they would maintain the validity of their own constitution, and would hardly vote for anything which would destroy the work of their own hands, and expose the iniquity of their own conduct. Besides, sir, a large number of these men do not want a settlement of this question. That would bring peace not only to Kansas, but to the Union; and their vocation would be gone. It is not peace that they seek or desire. It is agitation. Did they seek peace—did they honestly desire to change the constitution by peaceful and speedy means—they would be here, sir, advocating the admission of Kansas as a State, at the earliest possible day, that they might then take its government into their own hands, and make such a constitution and laws as would suit themselves. There can be but one of two reasons why they do not pursue this course: either they know they are not, as they claim to be, a majority of the people; or, if they are a majority, they prefer strife, agitation, civil war, and bloodshed, to a peaceful settlement of this question. And all this can, and I fear will, be brought about by the rejection of the Lecompton constitution.

In this spirit, and with this end in view, they pretend that no change can be made in the constitution until the year 1864, and that the curse of slavery will be fixed upon them until that time, if not forever. And this is done in the face of the Bill of Rights, which provides, in article two, that—

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

And also, in the face of the plain meaning of the article in the schedule which provides, that the constitution, after the year 1864, cannot be altered except in a manner prescribed; but says nothing whatever in regard to it between the time of its adoption and the period above named, 1864:

"Sec. 14. After the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change its constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the representatives: said delegates so elected shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

The report of the territorial committee of the Senate, presented on the 18th of February last, in reference to this question, says:

"The Lecompton convention has provided a full, lawful, and perfect remedy for every conceivable grievance, and placed the remedy in the unrestricted hands of the majority of the people, by inserting in the constitution the following distinct and unequivocal recognition of power."

That is in the second article of the bill of rights, to which I have just referred.

Again, Mr. President, if all change were prohibited until 1864, it seems to me that it comes with an ill grace from the especial advocates of the doctrine of popular sovereignty to deny to the people the right to make a change in their organic law, in spite of any prohibition whatever, whenever they see fit. And it is not at all consistent for them to maintain that the sovereigns of to-day may frame a constitution which cannot be changed without revolution by the sovereigns of to-morrow. If this be true, sir, then have the people of these United States passed through a great many revolutions without their knowing it; for nearly every old State in the Union, and some of the new States, have changed their constitutions within the past half century. But, on this point, I will take the liberty to refer to very high authority—the distinguished Senator from New York, [MR. SEWARD.] In his speech, delivered in the Senate on the 2d of July, 1856, on the admission of Kansas as a State, under the Topeka constitution, he says:

"I take the constitution, as we must all take it, for better or for worse—just as it is—or we cannot admit the State at all. The people in the new States make their constitutions. Our power is limited to the admission or rejection of a State, whatever its constitution may be. Again, it is not clear that the provision complained of by the Senator from Georgia will prevent the people of Kansas from subverting this constitution, and establishing a new one at any time short of the expiration of nine years. The constitution of the State of New York, established in 1821, provided for alterations to be made with the consent of two successive Legislatures. A party desiring radical innovation, and finding it impossible to obtain that object in the form prescribed in the constitution, secured a majority in the Legislature; and, without any constitutional authority, carried through a law by which proceedings were instituted for calling a convention, which was subsequently held, and which framed a new constitution. This new constitution, being submitted to the people, and approved by them, in derogation of the old one, became, and it yet remains, the supreme law of the land."

And so in the State of New Jersey. The constitution of 1776, which was abolished by the substitution of that of 1845, declared it "firm and inviolable, unless a reconciliation between Great Britain and the colonies should take place, and the latter taken under the protection of the Crown of Britain;" or, in other words, it was declared to be firm and inviolable forever. Yet a majority of the Legislature of that State passed an "act to provide for the election of delegates to prepare a constitution of the State, and for submitting the same to the people thereof for ratification or rejection." And this convention met and framed a constitution, which in due time was submitted and approved, and is now in full force in that State. During all which time, from the passage of that act until the new constitution went into operation, the people of that State were entirely unconscious that they were passing through a revolution.

I think, therefore, we need be under no concern in reference to the ability of the people of Kansas, both under the provisions of the constitution and the higher law of popular sovereignty, to change their constitution whenever they see fit.

Mr. President, the present opportunity of settling the dangerous question of slavery, and binding together with new and strong bonds of affection the different sections of our common country, should not pass unimproved. Bad as things have been in Kansas for the last few years, I feel very confident they will be rendered infinitely worse if we refuse to admit the State into the Union at this time. Frauds, iniquities, and acts of violence without number, have been perpetrated, perhaps, in an equal degree by both parties. They are painful in the extreme, and I am impatient that we should be relieved from their consideration, and that these people should be left to settle their own difficulties in their own way. "Non nostrum tantas componere lites." It is not for Congress to assume the duty of settling their domestic difficulties.

The evils to arise from the rejection of Kansas appear to me so great and fearful, and those which may arise from its admission so slight and transitory, that I cannot hesitate to plead for its admission. Reject it, and you reopen with increased ferocity the intestine war which has been raging for years past, but which at the present moment has nearly ceased. The strife, then, will not be confined to the inhabitants of that region, but auxiliaries from free States on the one side, and slave States on the other, with arms in their hands, will rush to the seat of war, thirsting for each other's blood. And, sir, if the Union should survive the rejection, which I doubt, (for the united South would consider it a declaration that hereafter no slave State shall be admitted into the Union,) who can fail to see that war cannot be confined to the locality of Kansas? It will go into bordering States. It will be a sectional war, and the knell of the Union will then be rung. At present there is a calm in Kansas. For the sake of the Union, do not disturb it; do not raise another storm which, in its fury, may sweep away not only Kansas, but yourselves. Leave the people of Kansas free to fight their own battles for supremacy, under their own State government and laws. They will soon settle down as the citizens of all the other States have done, and we shall hear no more of bleeding Kansas or of bordering ruffians. More than all, the slavery agitation, banished from the Halls of Congress, will cease to distract us, and our beloved Union will be established on a basis which, I trust in God, may never be overthrown.

MR. HAMMOND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

MR. GWIN. I hope the Senator will allow us to have an executive session. This subject may be postponed until to-morrow, and he will then have the floor upon it.

MR. BIGLER. I will state that the Senator from South Carolina moved an adjournment in order that he might be entitled to the floor to-morrow. If it is understood that he will have the floor, then he will have no objection to an executive session.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (MR. STUART.) Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw the motion to adjourn?

MR. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

MR. GWIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

MR. CRITTENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. G. S. DEAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL.

MR. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 271) to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues; when the Speaker signed the same.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the reconsideration of the vote by which Senate joint resolution No. 3, to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to dropped and retired naval officers," was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; on which Mr. WHITELEY was entitled to the floor.

MR. QUITMAN. Was not the Army bill postponed to this day?

The SPEAKER. The consideration of the Army bill was postponed to this day; but the pending proposition is a question of higher dignity than the consideration of the Army bill. That will be the first business in order after the pending joint resolution shall have been disposed of.

MR. PHELPS. If the gentleman from Delaware will yield the floor, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given. My object is to have the bill referred to a committee.

MR. HARLAN. I want to make a proposition of the same kind. If the privilege extend all round the House I will not object.

Mr. BLISS. I have been trying for several days past to get the floor for the same purpose.

Mr. PHELPS. Well, then, I hope a few minutes will be allowed for the purpose of introducing bills.

Mr. HARLAN. I object to all this favoritism.

Mr. EDIE. I call for the regular order of business.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. With the permission of the gentleman from Delaware, I desire to submit a motion to have printed, for the use of the House, reports of the balances of appropriations on the 22d of January, 1858, for the several Executive Departments.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSITIONS FOR CALL OF STATES, ETC.

Mr. KINGSBURY. I ask to have taken from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 82, that it may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Objection was made.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to gentlemen offering resolutions and bills if there be an understanding that all shall have an opportunity of doing the same.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask that consent may be given to the submitting of this proposition to the House, that half an hour be set apart for the calling of States for the introduction of bills for reference.

Mr. BLISS. Say for bills or resolutions.

Mr. PHELPS. There is some objection made to the introduction of resolutions.

Mr. GROW. Then I shall object to the introduction of bills.

Mr. PHELPS. I will modify my proposition. I propose that half an hour shall be set apart for the introduction of bills for reference, and of resolutions to which no objection shall be made.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Extend the time, so that all the States may be called. Half an hour may not be sufficient.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to make a suggestion to my friend. I ask him to make another limitation—that bills are not to be brought back here on motions to reconsider.

Mr. PHELPS. I am very willing to do that.

Mr. SEWARD. I entirely object to any arrangement of that sort. Let us progress regularly with the business.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. WHITELEY. In rising to express my views on this resolution, I wish simply to state my reasons for voting for it, and for entering my protest against the original bill, establishing the naval board, passed in February, 1855. The proposition now before the House, coming from the Senate, is a simple one. On the 28th of February, 1855, the bill establishing what is generally called the naval board was passed, and under its decisions, some two hundred naval officers were displaced, and, I should call it, disgraced. Finding themselves thus disgraced and disgrated; deprived of rank and position, they came back, asking the last Congress to do that little act of justice that was left to them: to give them naval courts of inquiry, before which they could go and state their cases, and see if they could not procure justice from men who were promoted over their heads; and could not convict this first board of an act of injustice toward them.

Congress passed such an act on the 16th of January, 1857, and under its operation one hundred and eight officers went before the court; and out of that number, the court was compelled, by the record and by the evidence which these disgraced officers brought before it, to replace some sixty-seven. This resolution asks that the balance of these officers—from sixty-seven to one hundred and eight—whom this court decided to be unfit, either mentally, physically, or professionally, for the naval service, should be allowed to go before the President, and that the President should say, not as the executive, but as the judicial officer, revising the records of this court, whether any of these forty-odd officers should be renominated to the Senate for their old rank and position in the Navy. That is the proposition before this House, as passed by the Senate.

I could have much to say against this original bill, but I do not consider it either important or pertinent to the question before us. The deed is done, and its effect is stamped upon the Navy and upon the country. All this resolution asks, is that we shall remedy the injustice of that act as far as we can.

There was a remark made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] yesterday, which I regretted that he made. It was that the object of the act of 1855 was to purge the Navy of rotten material. Mr. Speaker, if the material of which the Navy was at that time purged was rotten, God defend the country from the sound material of the American Navy.

Is the gentleman willing to stigmatize such men as Stewart and Bartlett, Morris, Gilliss, and others, whose heads have been stricken off by that iniquitous act, as rotten material? Men who first made, and then defended, the Navy? Men who have shed glory on the Navy by their practical, as well as their scientific, seamanship—men who have given reputation to our Navy in every land and upon every sea, rotten material? Why, sir, who were the sound material in the war of 1812-15? If they are to be called by the gentleman from Maryland rotten material, then the whole thing is rotten, and the sooner we break up the Navy the better. If these men are rotten material, then I call upon the gentleman from Maryland to answer me this question: why did not this secret board—this board which covered up its acts with the dark cloud of silence—keep a record, and let us know in what the rottenness of these officers consists? The gentleman says it was not the fault of the board; it was the fault of the Secretary of the Navy that he did not give them instructions to keep a record. I differ with the gentleman from Maryland in that opinion. It may be so; I have not read the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy. It may be that he never ordered them to keep a record. But if he did not, I ask this House why these men, when they were sitting as judges, nay, when they were sitting as so many attorneys general and judges-advocate, when they were to put out of their places their fellow-officers, why is it that they did not keep a record, even if it was not ordered by the Secretary of the Navy? They owed it to themselves as judges; they owed it to themselves as officers; they owed it to themselves as men, to give the world the reasons on which they acted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so much for that branch of the subject. This Senate resolution is merely, in my opinion, a confirmation of the power which the President possesses. I hold that the President, after the passage of this resolution, has the constitutional power and the legal right to inspect these records, and nominate to the Senate any officer whom he may think has been unjustly dealt with by these courts of inquiry. But as a matter of assurance, to make the matter perfectly sure, it is desirable that this resolution should be passed so that there should be no doubt as to the power of the President.

Now, sir, another reason: I call the attention of the House to the fact that the men composing the courts of inquiry under the act of the last Congress, were, I believe, all of them, men who had been promoted in consequence of the action of the first board. Sir, I have no complaint to make against these men; I have no charge to make against them; I believe, not knowing them personally, that they were men of honor. But believing this fact, I know this further fact, that they were human beings, and the epaulets on their shoulders and the military coats on their backs did not prevent their feelings as human beings from operating upon them. They were acting upon the cases of those who, if replaced in office, would affect themselves in their chances for promotion; and I know that such considerations will have their effect upon men whether in military or civil life. And it is upon this principle alone that I can account for the strange and curious findings of these courts of inquiry to which I shall call the attention of the House.

The law of 1857 said that these courts should investigate the physical, mental, professional, and moral fitness of these officers for the naval service, who having been dropped, retired, or furloughed, under the act of 1855, should choose to claim a trial. Now sir, let me refer to the findings of that board in one case just to convince the House of the strangeness of these judgments.

I do not give the names because, although this paper has been printed, it has not been made public:

"1. That the said Captain —, is morally and professionally fit for the naval service.

"2. That the evidence shows no unfitness from a want of bodily health or strength.

"3. That his mental and physical temperament is shown to be of such a character as to unfit him for active service in his present rank."

Now, what strikes me as peculiar in this third clause, and the one which ostracised the officer, is that his mental and physical temperament unfitted him not for the Navy, but for his rank in the Navy.

He is sane enough to be a midshipman. He is sane enough to be a lieutenant, or commander, but his mental temperament unfits him from holding the rank of captain. He stood in some one's way, and must therefore be displaced.

I want the gentleman from Maryland, or anybody else, to justify such a finding upon law, equity, or common sense. I can understand the expression mental or physical temperament, but taken in connection with the subsequent portion of the finding, I confess it is beyond my comprehension. They say that he is professionally fit, but his mental temperament unfits him. They say that he is morally and professionally fit for the naval service. Well, sir, does not that give the contradiction to the third finding, that his mental temperament disqualifies him? I defy any man in reason to say that I am professionally fit in whatever is my business, and then that my mental temperament makes me unfit. There is a contradiction in terms. The second finding is, that the evidence shows no unfitness for a want of bodily health or strength. Does not that give a contradiction to the third finding, that his physical temperament disqualifies him? I want this finding dispassionately considered. Will gentlemen tell me that this is not a case where the President ought not to have taken up the ridiculous verdict to which I have referred, set it aside, and sent this man's name to the Senate to be recommended in his rank, from which he has been thus rudely and wrongfully dismissed? Just think of a board of captains of the Navy, who may understand the temper of iron, turning themselves into mental philosophers, to decide on the mental and physical temperament of their fellow-officers! I would as lief refer to them such a question for decision, as to refer to jack-tars of the fore-castle a question of theology. Think of this board, after having declared a man professionally fit, being driven to the miserable subterfuge of saying that his mental temperament unfits him. This involves a study of abstract questions of philosophy which I say without disrespect to any one, very few of the officers of our Navy are competent to decide. There is no reflection intended upon their education; but, sir, it is beyond denial that the finding of the board I have alluded to involves flat contradictions in terms.

Another case is that of a passed midshipman. The charge against him was, that he was unhealthy, physically unfit. The court found him physically unfit, because he had been previously in ill health; and that, too, when the certificate of a board of surgeons had been laid before it that his health had been entirely restored. He had been in ill health at one time; and, in 1857, this court decided that this man was physically incapable for the naval service of the country, although it had, staring it in the face, the certificate of physicians that his health had been perfectly restored. Who, under the canopy of heaven, could wish such a verdict to stand? Is not that such a case where the President ought to interfere?

I must hurry over these cases. There are many of them, and would consume three days in referring to them. The strangest case is the one to which I shall call the attention of the lawyers of this House. It is the case of a lieutenant whom the court certified one day that he was morally, mentally, and physically fit for the naval service, and directed the verdict to be entered by the judge-advocate; and yet, the next day, without any action of the President, the supervising power, came in and moved a reconsideration, and declared that he was unfit. Is not that a case where the President ought to interfere? Was not that court "functus officio" so far as this man was concerned, the moment they directed their clerk to enter a verdict upon their proceedings? I put it to any man to say whether a court of inquiry, after finding that an officer is fit, and having put that finding upon the record, it can immediately afterwards make another finding? Because, forsooth, a motion to reconsider was not made, and that motion laid upon the table, is the officer's right to be affected?

There is another case still stronger. Because an officer did not "meet certain charges with the dignity and spirit of an officer and gentleman," because he did not challenge his assailant, the court found him unfit for the naval service. Whatever the members may have individually thought of dueling, they had in justice no right as a court to make such a finding. They had no right to condemn a man because he refused to violate the laws of his country. It is in every way the most iniquitous verdict ever rendered from any body of men wearing the appearance of a court. They find that he did not meet the charges with the dignity and spirit becoming a gentleman. He repelled the charges, and asked for a trial. The commodore would not give it to him. This court, I do not know which one it was, thought that he might have been innocent, but he ought to have challenged his assailant. They decided that because he did not so challenge his assailant he must be condemned. Is not this one of the cases where the President ought to interfere? I ask whether any fair man taking up that verdict on appeal, would not in justice turn out the court, and recommit this officer? They put him upon his trial on many charges, for being engaged in business, smuggling, &c., but they acquitted him from them all, and found him guilty because he refused to fight a duel.

Then again, sir, these courts gave themselves great latitude under those four qualifications of mental, physical, moral, and professional fitness. I am told that in one case they absolutely inquired into the relations subsisting between the officer and his wife. They went, or wanted to go, into the secrets of the bed-chamber, to know whether this man and his wife had ever quarreled. Now, is it not outrageous, is it not too bad, in this boasted free and enlightened country, that when you are trying a man upon his fitness as a sailor, you should inquire whether he and his wife ever had any little quarrels in the whole course of their connubial life? And yet that was done, and it is upon this record. Not only that, sir; but I am told by one of the counsel—and I may be permitted to say here, that these applicants had as able counsel as this country could produce, in their defense—that in some of these courts, when testimony was attempted to be given on the part of the United States, and counsel for the applicants objected, they overruled the objection before they even heard what it was. Now, is not that a case in which the President should at least see that proper evidence was received by the courts? Not only did they do that, but I am told that they would receive hearsay evidence, and did receive it; that they would receive opinions of and concerning facts, instead of having the facts themselves; that they would receive parol evidence of the contents of official documents and records; that they would receive allegations of acts and declarations of others not made in the presence of the applicants; that they would receive opinions of motives or intentions, without specific facts, and even the motives of the witnesses' opinion as to legal obligations and duties; they did everything else that no law under the canopy of heaven authorized them to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I put it to the House whether we will deny these people, who have been treated so illegally, (I use the word in its application to law,) the poor boon of letting the President, as a judge under the Constitution and laws, inspect these records; supervise them; not send every one of them to the Senate, but, in those cases where he sees that injustice has been done, ask the Senate, because of that injustice, to reinstate the officers? That is the proposition; that is its sole effect. Let the President take up the records; read them; see what has been done towards these naval officers; and recommit, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, those whom he thinks have been unjustly dealt with. It was said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] if I understood him correctly, that the Executive would scarcely dare to assume the responsibility of recommitting men who have been removed by the action of this board, and put them in charge of our national ships. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may have strange notions upon this matter; but my belief is, that many as brave and honorable men were turned out of the Navy by the action of that board as any two hundred who were promoted by it. I know some of them, and I know them to be such. It is true, some of them are not remarkable for particular refinement or courtesy of manner; but they are what our country wants when storms and enemies approach. They are sailors, and know what to do without running to the fore-castle for information. They are fine, rollicking Jack tars; and, when the danger approaches, they know their duty, and dare do it. Keep them in the service, and our Navy will have such a reputation, if we ever have the misfortune to be engaged in another war, as our Navy acquired in 1812-15.

I do not mean to mention the names of any of these men; nor do I mean to detain the House much longer upon this question. My object has been, by reading some four or five of the findings of these courts, to convince the House that they ought at least to do this simple act of justice—not to restore all of these officers, but simply to give the President power to revise the records himself, and let him and the Senate decide whether any of them, and if so, which of them, shall be restored. Prior to the passage of the act of February 28, 1855, we had a Navy which, in my opinion, could have stood against the world; but since then there is scarcely any one "so poor as to do it reverence." Why, sir, why is this? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it has been the direct and immediate result of the act of 1855. There was a time, sir, when, in the darkest hour of our national trials, our people naturally turned to the Navy for protection. There was a time, sir, when we all considered our national honor in the special keeping of our Navy. But, sir, that time is past and gone; and it will be irrevocably past and gone unless this simple act of justice is done to these disgraced officers, or unless these censors of the Navy, these men who set themselves up as judges in that Israel, are displaced by younger, if not, perchance, by better officers. The whole esprit de corps of the Navy is now gone; and the only way in which we can effect its salvation, in my opinion, is by doing justice, simple justice, to men who have been most unjustly treated.

Mr. BOCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have to say to you, and to the members of this House, that it is to me no labor of love to rise to address the House upon the question now under consideration. I do it simply from a stern and a solemn sense of duty. I have seen enough, Mr. Speaker, and heard enough, since I have been giving my attention to naval affairs—and indeed I have seen and heard enough during this discussion in the House—to make me feel that he who rises here, as I rise here now, has an ungracious task to perform. I come not forward, sir, here, on this occasion, to plead the cause of any friend, or of any man. No blood of mine runs through the veins of any officer in the American Navy. I come not here, I say, to plead the cause of individuals. I rise here to raise one solemn, earnest voice in behalf of our country and our country's service. I know that he who does that has an unwelcome task to perform.

And now, Mr. Speaker, while gentlemen, friends of mine and men of ability, have spoken upon both sides of this question, permit me, in the beginning of my remarks, to call the attention of members to the difference in the tone and manner of the speakers.

Here was my eloquent friend from Charleston, [Mr. MILES]—and I speak it in no language of compliment—who did himself honor and distinguished credit by the opening speech which he made on this occasion; and, sir, what was the tone and tenor of his remarks? He appealed for mercy, for mercy and executive clemency, for men and friends. On the other side, there was the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] who opened this debate; and what were the tone and tendency of his remarks? He, sir, spoke for the service of the country; and that was the only appeal he made to the House.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BOCOCK. With great pleasure.

Mr. MILES. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman has misunderstood me. I spoke yesterday without any sort of preparation, and without the least previous attention to the subject. I spoke simply from the impulse of the moment, and of my own heart. I was not aware that the matter was to come up, and therefore I had no intention to have spoken at all. But I did not mean to put my argument in favor of the resolution on the ground of mercy or clemency alone, solely, or even specially and particularly. I put it upon the ground of justice to those to whom I thought injustice had been done by the action of these boards. But I did say that there might be cases of old men who had worn themselves out in the service, who, perhaps, were no longer capable of discharging active duties—men who had worn themselves out in the service of their country, who had covered themselves and the country with glory; and that these men ought not to be, like a worn-out battle steed, turned adrift in their old age to scorn, to contumely, or, still worse to a brave and generous heart, to the pity of the world.

Mr. BOCOCK. I accept the explanation of my friend; and I need nothing more than the speech just made by him to show from what ground he views this subject. Permit me here, as I intended to do in another part of my remarks, simply to say, that from all the gentlemen of the House who have debated the question on his side, you have heard the same thing about turning out old and valiant and time-honored naval officers, with disgrace upon them. I deny it. This is beautiful in poetry and very eloquent in delivery before the House, but it lacks one thing to make it impressive and powerful; and that is, that it is not the fact.

Sir, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WHITELEY] told you this morning (and I take this a little out of the order in which I had intended to treat it) that before the assembling of the board under the act of 1855, the Navy was in a beautiful condition. In the hands of that plastic master, a beautiful picture of the condition of the Navy, prior to the act of 1855, was spread out before us. And now, said he, all that is gone. This esprit de corps of the Navy is lost. An eloquent and beautiful picture he drew; but it needs one thing, and that is, that it is not the fact. I call upon any gentleman to show me any proof that the Navy has not as much esprit de corps, as much spirit, as much gallantry, as much devotion to the country's service, as it ever had in the history of this land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to approach this subject a little more regularly, and I hope not to detain the House very long. The gentleman from Delaware and other gentlemen who have spoken on that side of the question, have stated pretty distinctly what the object of the resolution is. After having this naval reform board acting on the cases of these gentlemen, and after their having an appeal from that naval board to a special court of inquiry, and after their having been considered by both these tribunals unfit further to continue on the active-service list, they make this application to Congress to permit them to go to the President and ask him to restore them to the active-service list. That is all. Now, what course would the President take? I would be the last man in the House, Mr. Speaker, to indulge in the slightest imputation against the present President of the United States. I am his political supporter; and—if I may venture to say so in this assembly without having the appearance of arrogance or presumption—I am his personal friend. How are such matters as this usually conducted? And how will this thing be done, provided the resolution passes? Has the President of the United States, already burdened with duty, the time to take up the records of these courts of inquiry, examine into them, and determine whether injustice has been done, or whether justice has been done? Does any man who knows the ordinary operation of such things believe it for a moment? Let this bill pass, and what will you see? You will see these gentlemen going to their friends and getting them to enlist their friends, and going with their troops and trains to the executive mansion, beseeching the President to put them back into the Navy.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to understand whether the gentleman, while he concedes that injustice may have been done, will refuse to do justice because the President will be burdened with applications, and because he will not have time to do them justice?

Mr. BOCOCK. I will see, in the end, whether injustice has been done or not. I am examining what the nature of the operation of the thing will be. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that it will turn out otherwise. I trust that the executive officers of this country will have time, and will command the time, to examine these records, if sent to them. If so, I think that many of these gentlemen who expect to get in will find themselves unsuccessful.

Well, sir, how is this case in the view of it which I have presented? In 1855, previous to the passage of the act commonly called the act to promote the efficiency of the Navy, applications had come up from every quarter of the country, from almost every officer of the Navy, from everybody who took an interest in the Navy, asking the Congress of the United States to pass some act to give efficiency and energy to the Navy. As far back as I have any recollection of the action of the Naval Committee, a distinguished citizen of Ohio, who was then a member of this House, directed his attention, and the attention of the committee, to an attempt to create an efficiency board, to get rid of officers of the Navy who were, not rotten, not corrupt, but inefficient. The proposition failed at that time.

At a subsequent session of Congress, a distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, who is now quite much talked of in the land, and who talks a good deal in the land himself, and who was then in the position of chairman of the Naval Committee, directed his attention to the subject, and prepared a bill for the reorganization of the Navy, so as to promote its efficiency by retiring disabled and inefficient officers. That, too, failed. But the attention of the country was directed to the subject, and the effect was to bring back a response from all parts of the country, asking that this bill might be adopted. What state of things was then found in the Navy? We found the Navy stocked with officers, very few of whom—not one fifth—were employed. We found men lingering in the rank of midshipmen at the age of forty. We found men lieutenants, not entitled to command, at the age of fifty odd, and promotion entirely cut off. We found in the highest grades of the Navy men who had not seen service, some of them for sixteen or twenty years. There they stood, incompetent to serve, inefficient, worn out, or whatever you choose to call it, blocking up the way of promotion against younger and more efficient officers. Let me read, in this connection, what the late Secretary of the Navy (Mr. Dobbin) said in regard to this subject:

"And yet, such was the condition of the Navy—as urged by Secretaries and conceded by statesmen, officers, and citizens—such the loud cry for prompt reform, echoed and re-echoed through the country—that Congress, in its wisdom, failing to pass the general and more comprehensive bills originally reported by the committees, instituted this summary tribunal with signal majorities."

Now, sir, permit me to say that this bill was not the elaborate bill framed by the committee, of which I was a member, during that session; but a bill originating in the Senate, which passed the Senate by an overwhelming majority, and which passed this House by a large majority. The Secretary of the Navy, who had been some little time in office, and was well acquainted with the mental and physical character of the officers of the Navy, by reputation, impaneled a board of the very first men in the Navy—a board of men who, but for the clamor raised by those interested in and affected by their action, would have been to-day universally acknowledged to consist of the first men in the naval service. In reference to the character of the men composing this board, the Secretary of the Navy says:

"The officers selected to compose the board were, in terms highly laudatory, pronounced fit men for the delicate task. Indeed, when their names were announced, there was a warm and general expression of favor and gratification, rarely exhibited."

I know that to be the fact, and can confirm this statement of the Secretary of the Navy from my own personal knowledge; for at that time my attention was particularly called to the subject. What was the nature of that board? Gentlemen entirely misinterpret it, or misunderstand it. It has been characterized by gentlemen upon this floor, as a Star Chamber, as a secret inquisition. It has been said that this board sat with closed doors to try their brother officers, without giving them an opportunity to be present to examine witnesses, or to be heard by counsel. Sir, this was no such board. It tried no man. It did not sit in trial of any officer. It was not a judicial board by any means. What was the nature of it? It was conceded and generally known that there were in the naval service a large number of men who ought not to be on the active list. But gentlemen say, if they ought not to be on the active list of the Navy, why not try them by court-martial, or court of inquiry, and drop them? I answer, in the language of Secretary Dobbin, that these courts-martial and courts of inquiry have been in existence all the time, and yet the evils still existed in spite of them. Something else, then, was wanted. The courts-martial and the courts of inquiry then in existence would not do. Let me suggest here that the courts-martial and courts of inquiry, as then organized, might pronounce a man innocent, and yet he ought not to be on the active list of the Navy. Many of these officers entered the Navy very young, as midshipmen; and though the poet says, yet you cannot always tell, from what the boy is, what the man will be. His qualifications as a midshipman when a boy may be good enough, and yet, when he comes to be developed as a man, and his character expands into manhood, you may find that he wants something or other to fit him for an officer in command. He has committed no offense. He has done nothing which could bring down upon him the sentence of a court-martial.

In another case, a man may have acquired habits and a reputation such that the Secretary of the Navy may be satisfied in his own mind that he is unfit for active service. There are many such men, who, the Secretary of the Navy knows, are unfit to have control of the Navy; and although they may sometimes apply for service, he will not trust the flag of the country in their hands, because it would be disgraced. They have no opportunity, therefore, of doing anything for which a court-martial could try them; and yet it may be apparent to every one acquainted with the circumstances, that they are unfit to be on the active list of the naval service; and a judicious man would say that such men ought not to stand in the way of those who are competent and efficient, and who would add to the glory of the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to know whether this board called the officers whose cases they acted on, before them; whether they took any testimony to prove their unfitness as officers; or whether they acted on their own knowledge?

Mr. BOCOCK. I understand that they acted upon the latter only, and that was the intention. But, sir, I was about to explain more fully the purposes for which this court was organized. I contend, as I contended when the measure was before the House, that it conferred no new power upon the President. The President had already power to put any officer of the Navy upon the leave-of-absence list if he chose. He had power to put him upon furlough pay if he chose, and he had power, and actually exercised it, of striking a man from the rolls of the Navy altogether. But the object of the law was to provide him with a board of advisers, leading men of the Navy, who should furnish him the information on which he might exercise that power. No man was condemned by that board, because no man was tried by it. It was a board of advisement only. It acted upon the knowledge of the officers of the Navy, and not from evidence of any particular transaction.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I want to know where the gentleman gets authority for saying that this board of fifteen acted from their own personal knowledge of the character of the officers of the Navy who were affected by their own decision?

Mr. BOCOCK. I say that such is my belief.

Mr. SEWARD. Then the gentleman states it simply as a mere matter of belief, without any information on which to base his statement.

Mr. BOCOCK. Yes, sir; I made the statement as my belief, and I never heard that they acted upon any other information. But, sir, I was going on to say that if the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power which was vested in him before the formation of this board, had, upon his own motion, put men upon the furlough list, or dropped them from the rolls of the Navy, you would have heard a clamor raised against the exercise of this one-man power. It is true, sir, that he had the power to make a general reform in the Navy upon his own motion; but it would have required a bold man to have done it. But, sir, this law granted to the President of the United States the right to call around him a cabinet of advisers of fifteen of the most efficient men of the Navy. The action of that board did not compel the removal of any man. It made recommendations to the President, upon which he acted in purifying the Navy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have heard it all round here that these men have been disgraced and degraded by the action of the President, upon the recommendation of this board. How gentlemen can arrive at such a conclusion, in reference to some of these men, I cannot understand. Gentlemen have, in their places upon this floor, been eloquent in praise of Commodore Stewart. No man thinks more highly of Commodore Stewart than I do; no man appreciates more highly the service he has rendered to the country than I do. I only differ with gentlemen as to the action of the naval board and of the President. Instead of believing that action as being a stigma and disgrace upon Commodore Stewart, I believe that it was an act of clemency. What! a man eighty odd years old; a man who had braved the battle and the breeze for years, and who had worn himself out in the service of his country, still being allowed to remain upon the active-service list, liable to be called upon at his time of life for the discharge of active duty! No, sir; it would either have been unjust to him, or else your record would have pronounced a falsehood. Your record holds these men forth, to the Secretary of the Navy and to the country, as men ready for the service. Those upon the active-service list the Secretary of the Navy and the President had power to command into service. The board steps in here, with this wise and beneficent action, and takes that old man and shelters him from the danger of being called into active service. Disgrace! Why, sir, he receives every cent he did receive and would have received under any circumstances. He is upon the leave-of-absence list, and receives all he would have received if this board had never acted.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Upon what list was he placed?

Mr. BOCOCK. He was retired upon the legal leave-of-absence pay of a senior captain, which, I believe, is $4,500 a year. The action of the board has not affected his pay at all. Every man upon the leave-of-absence list gets precisely the same pay he did before.

The commodore considers it a disgrace, says my friend. As my attention is called to the subject, gentlemen will pardon me for making a remark which, I fear, will be considered unkind. Any unkindness is the furthest thing from my intention. I would not have made the remark if the gentlemen from Delaware [Mr. WHITELEY] had not provoked it. The fact that Commodore Stewart, with his intelligence, has held himself forth to the country as a disgraced and injured man, is the strongest proof to me that, at the age of eighty, he has not the possession of those strong and vigorous powers of mind for which he was formerly noted. The fact that he considers himself disgraced by the action of the naval board is the strongest argument against him. What, sir, merely to say that a man of eighty years is not able to discharge, physically if you choose, mentally if you choose, the duties required of a naval officer! Call that disgrace? That is the whole thing.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Has not Commodore Stewart been in active service at the Philadelphia navy-yard ever since the board was in session?

Mr. BOCOCK. I was about coming to that point. I want to say that the action of the naval board, by some clemency on the part of the executive power, has not affected Commodore Stewart in the least. It interposed, and has kept him in his pay of $4,500 a year. I have believed, however, that it was not done from any conviction that Commodore Stewart was fully competent, at his age, to discharge the duties required of him in that office; but simply because the Executive wished, in the exercise of the power confided to him, to put balm upon the supposed wound of Commodore Stewart. I shall not pursue the course of argument pursued by the gentleman from Delaware. He stated a great many things from hearsay. I have heard things said in regard to the physical efficiency of Commodore Stewart; but on this point I have nothing further to say.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am in almost daily intercourse with Commodore Stewart at home. I know, of my own knowledge, that he is entirely equal to the performance of every duty required of a person stationed at a navy-yard; and further than that, I believe, sir, that he is equal to the discharge of every duty required of a captain of the Navy. I think it due to Commodore Stewart, and to truth and justice, that I should say this much. I trust that I may have an opportunity to speak more at large.

Mr. BOCKOCK. It seems to be due to truth and justice for almost every member to interrupt me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman will do me the justice to say that I have not interrupted him before, and that I have interposed no objection to action on the part of this House.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Will the gentleman tell me how old a man Commodore Stewart is?

Mr. FLORENCE. I think he is seventy-eight years of age.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Not older than that?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not think he is. It was a matter of conversation between one of my colleagues and myself. Though seventy-eight years old, so far as ability to perform naval duties is concerned, he is not more than fifty.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, what is the moral, mental, physical, and professional fitness of Commodore Stewart for naval service?

Mr. FLORENCE. So far as my judgment is concerned, I think he is morally, mentally, physically, and professionally equal to the performance of any duty required of a captain in the Navy.

Mr. BOCKOCK. This is the opinion of my friend from Pennsylvania, but not that of the board. I put it to gentlemen whether it was any very great mistake of judgment if the board came to the conclusion that, because of the great age at which Commodore Stewart had arrived, he might not be fully competent for efficient service on board a ship? Was that a grievous error? I doubt whether it is an error or a mistake when they have attributed to him nothing but the fact of his age. I understand from a gentleman near me that he is eighty-three years of age. There is, then, a difference of opinion between the gentleman and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In that point of view, I put it to the House whether it is a great cause of condemnation of this board that they were of opinion that a man at the age of eighty-three was not fully competent, physically, to discharge all of the duties required of a naval officer? The Government came in at that point and says that it will not longer hold that officer upon the active list; that it will take him under its beneficent care, and to the end of his life will not ask him to engage in active service, though it gives him leave-of-absence pay.

A large number of men were affected by the action of this board; they were scattered all through the country; many of them were perhaps estimable and worthy gentlemen, and they were greatly outraged in their feelings because they were not kept upon the active-service list. They enlisted their friends here and elsewhere in their behalf, and the country was very much agitated in relation to this question. Perhaps, too, Mr. Speaker, in some few instances, the board had acted unwisely. It is human to err. That court may not have been accurate in all its decisions. I ask if it could have been otherwise? I ask if it could have been expected that it would have been otherwise? If you find a human being with an unsound limb, can you take off the unsound limb without taking a little sound flesh too? The difficulty is to know, in all such cases, where the line of demarcation exists. The difficulty exists everywhere in the physical and natural world. Who can draw the dividing line, in the regular succession of night and day—where the light ends and the darkness begins? So in this case; in undertaking to remove men who were not exactly suited for the naval service, some may have been removed who ought to have been left in the service. The great question, however, ought to be, has the thing done good, or has it done harm? Has it improved the naval service, or has it injured the naval service? Now, sir, permit me to ask who that sits in judgment upon this matter, what Secretary of the Navy, what other officer in charge of naval affairs, who occupies an impartial position, has come and told the House of Representatives that this thing has done harm, and that it ought to be obliterated? Who has done it? Secretary Dobbin did not. Secretary Dobbin held exactly the contrary opinion—that it had done unspeakable good to the naval service. He has left that opinion on record in his report. After saying that nothing ought to be done to interfere materially with the operations of the board, he goes on:

“I have an abiding conviction that history will prove that this work of reform reinvigorated the Navy; imparted to it a robust and active health; inspired the hearts of the young and gallant officers, hitherto drooping with hopeless despondency, with fresh energy and contentment with the service, warned the thoughtless and idle to quit the haunts of idleness and seek the path of duty leading to honor, and caused the country to repose with the more pride and confidence in the belief in the invincibility of this right arm of the service.”

That was the opinion of Secretary Dobbin. Who that knew him and was daily associated with him does not remember how he delighted to dwell upon the beneficial effects of this measure upon the condition of the Navy? He used to say, formerly when an order was issued to make out a complement of officers to take charge of a vessel, and an order was sent to an officer in any part of the country, he would send back word that his family were in very delicate health and he wished to be excused; in another case the officer would send word that somebody had died and left an estate upon his hands to manage, and he wished for a little longer indulgence; in another case that he had not been long enough with his family and friends, and that others had been longer out of employment, and he wished to be excused; but that after that law passed, as soon as he issued his orders the officers came without hesitation or delay; they were prompt in obedience to orders, anxious for the service and active in the discharge of their duties; and that by the new impulse given to the naval service, robust and vigorous health had been restored to that which was before a languishing and enfeebled body. So said Secretary Dobbin. What says Secretary Toucey? The naval service of the country is now under his charge, and it is to be presumed that he has the interests of that branch of the public service at heart. Has he presented to you in his report this gloomy picture of the effects of the Navy efficiency bill? I have not seen it. I have not heard it. Eye hath not seen, nor hath ear heard, what it has entered into the minds of gentlemen upon this floor to represent. Why, then, all this clamor? I do not wish to indulge in any harsh suspicions. I only know this, that the purloins of this Capitol have been haunted by the good friends of good men, who wanted their help in this matter.

[A message was received from the Senate by Mr. WILLIAM HICKEY, one of its assistant clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act for the relief of Henry Hubbard, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. BOCKOCK. I have heard some gentlemen say that they would like to pass a sweeping resolution, and put all of these officers back. All I have to say in relation to that matter is, that if you are going to put all these men back you will sink the vessel of the Navy, and you ought first to provide some means of escape for good and efficient officers.

But, sir, when this law was originally passed, it was conceded on all hands that there were some inefficient men in the Navy who ought to be out of it; every officer of the Navy you met said there was somebody in the Navy who ought not to be there, who was blocking the way to the promotion of others, and that the law ought to be passed to get rid of those men. Well, the law was passed; the ax fell, and each man who felt the smart condemned the law. There is an old distich which I might repeat here, but as I do not wish to pass reflections upon any one, I will let it pass. All were in favor of the passage of the law. Each one was willing to take his chance of being struck off for his chance of being promoted; but when the ax fell on him instead of on some other man, why each one was terribly affronted with the law—it was the most egregiously wicked law that had ever been passed in the world, and now no man can be found who should have been turned out.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the board did not try any man or inflict disgrace upon any man. I intended to have said a few more words upon that point, but I have been so interrupted in the regular course of my remarks that it seems now almost out of place.

I will say, however, in regard to those who have been placed on the leave-of-absence list, that the fact of their having been so placed is the best proof that they were considered incompetent for some cause that did not affect their standing. Those placed on that list were men advanced in years, and who, like Commodore Stewart, had rendered distinguished service to their country, and it was thought proper to give them a higher rate of pay as a reward for the distinguished services heretofore rendered. Those placed upon the furlough list are men who have become incompetent earlier in life, and have had no chance of rendering distinguished service to the country; they are given pay for life, but not as high a rate of pay as those who have done more service. The only question about stigma being attached to anybody was, as to those whose inefficiency was the result of their own fault. The language of the law was, that if a man became inefficient by his own fault, by dissipated habits, or by any cause over which he had control, he should be left out altogether, on a year's pay. The Government did not think that if a man had rendered himself incompetent he had any good claim upon the Government for an annual pension for life. He had become inefficient by his own fault, not by his own crime.

That was the action of the first board. It removed two hundred and one men from the active-service list. Forty-nine, I think, were dropped. A great clamor was immediately raised against the action of the board, and forthwith the subject was introduced into the two Houses of Congress. Much agitation took place on the subject. Editors and letter-writers appealed to the public mind, and some members of Congress were very soon found undertaking to subvert the action of the board. After long discussion in the Senate, a law was passed at the last session. It came here, and was passed without discussion. What did that law allow? It allowed any officer who thought himself aggrieved by the action of the former board to apply to the Secretary of the Navy, within a limited time, to have his case reexamined by a court of inquiry, before which he could appear, examine witnesses, and be represented by counsel. As has been said, these gentlemen had the services of the very highest and ablest counsel that the land afforded. These courts of inquiry, after full examination, came to the conclusion that the action of the former board might have been, perhaps, too harsh in a good many cases. In some of the cases they came to the conclusion that the action of the former board was right. Let me state to the House the statistics on the subject, for they have been greatly misunderstood here. Gentlemen have declared that in sixty-two out of one hundred and eight cases the action of the first board was shown to be egregiously wrong, and that the courts of inquiry proceeded to restore these men to the active service list of the Navy. That is all a mistake, sir.

“Question. How many officers were dropped, furloughed, or retired, by the naval board?”

“Answer. Two hundred and one, to wit: forty-nine dropped; eighty-one furloughed, and seventy-one retired.”

Now, out of the one hundred and eight cases where application was made for a reexamination by the courts of inquiry, only thirty-three officers were restored to the active-service list.

I know that the action of the former board was modified in sixty-two cases. Many officers who had been put by the former board on furlough pay, were put on leave-of-absence pay, and the decisions were altered in some such respects; but only thirty-three men out of the whole one hundred and eight, were restored to the active-service list, and only ten of the dropped officers were replaced on the active-service list in the three highest grades of the Navy. Others did not apply. Now when they had an opportunity to apply for a hearing, and did not do so, I draw the inference of their acquiescence in the decision of the first board. I do not say they approved it. I say they acquiesced in it. Is it not a fair presumption? They had, I believe, ninety days to make their application, if they were in the country. If they were out of the country, they had ninety days after their return, provided they returned within the year. There happened not one single case in which a man desired to appeal, and did not have an opportunity to do so. There is no such case on record. All that those had their cases revised by the court of inquiry. I have not examined the records of that court, but if I were to judge of them by the criticism which has been made upon them this morning by the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. WHITELEY,] I should come to a precisely different conclusion on them from that which he has reached. The gentleman was startled at the idea that a man could have mind enough to be a commander in the Navy, could have physical strength enough, and yet not have a temperament that would qualify him to be a commander in the Navy. That does not strike me as being such egregious folly as the gentleman from Delaware supposes. I can conceive a man of robust body, strong mind, well informed in his profession, to be yet unfit for command, because liable to excessive gusts of passion.

There was another case, Mr. Speaker, to which the gentleman referred. He says that a particular officer—I do not know his name—was turned out of the service because—that is the gentleman's inference—he did not challenge a person to fight a duel. Now, was the inference of my friend from Delaware correct? Is there no other way to resent an insult than by a challenge to fight a duel? Does the gentleman from Delaware take that position? Mark you, there is not a word said in the finding of the court about not challenging a man to fight a duel. They only say he did not resent an insult in a manly and proper spirit. And I put it to the gentleman from Delaware; I put it to my enthusiastic and gallant friend from Charleston, [Mr. MILES;] I put it to every man of manly temper on this floor to say, would he see an officer of the American Navy, a man whose profession is arms, permit himself to have a gross personal indignity inflicted upon him, and not resent it? And because the court thought that he did not show a proper spirit in resenting the insult, the gentleman from Delaware says that he was condemned because he did not challenge the offender to fight a duel.

Mr. WHITELEY. I am very sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Virginia, seeing that he has been so much interrupted; but I wish to state this case properly. The gentleman whose case I alluded to, I do not know; I never saw him until he was pointed out to me within a minute in the gallery. He is no friend of mine in any way or shape; but having no acquaintance with him, he cannot be an enemy. The charge against him was a charge of misconduct as an officer in certain dealings. He repelled the charge, as the records of the court show, denied it, branded it as false, and asked for a trial. When this court of inquiry tried him, they found that he was innocent of the charge, but implied, by the declaration, that he did not repel the charge as they thought he should—that he ought to have challenged his accuser. I admit that that is my deduction; and I tell the gentleman from Virginia that when the record is submitted to him, he can come to no other deduction from it. It was some mercantile transaction.

Mr. BOCK. I would not willingly do injustice to any officer of the Navy; I know nothing of the case; I do not know who the officer is; and I say, as I said before, that the case was only a supposed case to illustrate my position. I say that a man may resent an injury in a proper and manly spirit, without resorting to a challenge to fight a duel. It is not a fair inference, in a general way, from the declaration that a man did not resent an insult in a proper and manly spirit, that he was condemned for not fighting a duel.

I was going on to state the objections which are made to this bill. The board only restored thirty-three men to the active-service list. Ten men were restored from the dropped list to the active-service list in the three highest grades. Twenty-nine were changed on the reserved list from one place to another, or else were removed from the list of dropped to the reserved, and forty-six were left as they were. The others did not apply.

Now, sir, after all that has been done, after these two boards have thus acted, these men want another chance before the President. Sir, gentlemen around me were not all here during the last Congress. I was; and those who were here will bear me out in what I say. I did not vote for the law authorizing these courts of inquiry. The officers of the Navy desired that that law should pass. When it was suggested that the President then in place, and the Secretary of the Navy then in place, who were familiar with the whole matter, should have authority to restore some of them, they said, "No; it is not a place in the Navy we desire—we can find a living elsewhere; but we want the stain taken off from our skirts; we want to be tried and acquitted by a jury of our peers, and nothing else will satisfy us." Now they have had a trial by a jury of their peers; but when that does not suit them, they come and ask for executive clemency. I ask you what place they will occupy in the Navy if they get there? The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] has portrayed that matter so well that I will not touch the picture lest I might mar its truthful lines. I now only will ask, does the Navy need them? Is it for the good of the Navy to place them back? The evils in the Navy have already arisen from having too many officers upon the list. There was not employment for them, and they were left to rust in retirement. Now the number of officers in the higher grades of the Navy has already been much increased. The number of captains allowed by law is sixty-eight. Of these sixty-eight captains, according to the Naval Register of 1857, only thirty were employed. How many of these were upon sea duty? Thirteen. The action of these boards has already put back enough to make the number seventy-five. Then you have seventy-five captains already. There are fewer now upon duty than there were then. There are probably twenty-five employed upon all services: about thirteen upon sea duty.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to one point. He said that these would not interfere with the promotion of other men. I take issue with him. You have now seventy-five captains, and you may by this resolution increase it to eighty. There cannot be another captain made by the law as it now stands, until that number is decreased below sixty-eight.

Now let us look to the list of commanders. According to the Naval Register of 1857, the number of commanders of the Navy was ninety-six. Of these only fifty-nine were employed upon all services; on sea duties nineteen, coast survey two, mail steamers two. And yet this has been swelled up to one hundred and five already, and you propose to increase it still more. And when you have done that, no man can be promoted to that position until the number is reduced below ninety-six.

I wish to show you how it is that the action of these naval courts has increased the expenses of the American Navy—already too great—by some fifty thousand dollars a year; and you propose to increase it still more. I have here a tabular statement, showing the amount of expenses already added to the Navy. You will understand readily how that increase has been made, without my reading the statement. Gentlemen have been taken from the dropped list and put upon the active-service list, and other changes of a similar nature have been made. I make the difference of pay from fifty to sixty thousand dollars a year, and you propose to make it greater.

But I see that my time has nearly expired. I wish just to read an extract from a London paper. Gentlemen have said that no such proceeding as this is known in any other country. It is the constant practice in England for the Queen, by order in council, upon the recommendation of the Board of Admiralty, to put men upon the retired list whenever she pleases. A gallant admiral was placed upon the retired list, and he complained. The first lord of the Admiralty, (Sir C. Wood,) in reply, said:

"The honorable and gallant admiral opposite [Admiral Walcott] complained of having been placed on the reserved list; but unless some measure of that kind were adopted, it would be impossible to get rid of that enormous list of captains and admirals, which he agreed with his honorable friend [Mr. Williams] appeared in one sense a deceit. He did not like using a hard word, but he must say that the public were disgusted when they saw on the active list a number of officers who they knew could not be employed. He thought, therefore, that though the arrangement might be grating to the feelings of some gallant gentlemen, it was on the whole a wise measure; for without some such step, it would be impossible ever to reduce the number of officers to a proper amount. What was done was this. All officers of the rank of captain, rising from the head of the list, who had served for a certain number of years specified, received the rank of reserved rear-admirals, with the half-pay of admirals, rising in rank, but having no additional pay; and this had had the effect of gradually reducing the list of captains."

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not rise to take part in this debate at any length. I desire to bring this debate to a close, and I rose for the purpose of calling the previous question; but nevertheless, inasmuch as I am upon the floor, I will barely say that I do not agree with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCK,] who seems to think that no further legislation is necessary. I voted for the original law, and I have no doubt it was a good one. I think, however, that the manner in which it was carried out was highly objectionable. I never should have voted for it if I had supposed that the persons retired or dropped would not have had a hearing. I think the action of that board required, for its defense, all the able and ingenious gentlemen from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] could say in its behalf.

I was one of the three-fourths majority of the last Congress which passed an act to review the decisions of that court. The gentleman from Maryland thought proper, the other day, to pass a eulogy upon that board, and to say that the courts of inquiry, organized under the law of the last Congress, confirmed the wisdom and justice of the decisions of the first board. I thought proper to look into the correctness of that statement, and I find there were one hundred and eight cases of appeal to those courts of inquiry, all of which were reviewed by them. Of these one hundred and eight cases, sixty-two were reversed.

The gentleman says that they have been generally sustained as are the judgments of inferior courts in a court of appeal, and that we ought to be satisfied. I do not know what the course of judiciary proceedings may be in Maryland; but in my State, if a judge was overruled in a majority of the cases taken up from him on appeal, it would not be considered a matter of great congratulation on his part. Rabelais's judges used to throw once for the plaintiff and once for the defendant. That gave each party an equal chance. If the board of fifteen had pursued this course, they would have been right much oftener than they were. It turns out that their decisions have been overruled in nearly two thirds of the cases which were taken up on appeal. I do not propose, however, to discuss the proceedings of the board, or of the courts of inquiry. I think that, under the circumstances, both the laws were right. The first law was necessary; but having been so bunglingly executed, the second law became proper.

How stands the case before us? I find, in looking into the resolution, that the action of the President is limited to the forty-six persons whose cases have been examined. I have no objection to that. The only objection I really see to it is, that it will impose upon the President a large amount of labor; but the probability is, that, of the forty-six, there will not be a great number who will apply to him. If it be thought advisable to intrust him with that discretion, I am willing it shall be given to him.

I rose, Mr. Speaker, not to discuss the question, but to ask the House to terminate this discussion. We are debating the question whether we shall reconsider the reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the motion to reconsider be carried, then we shall have the resolution for discussion in the House; and if not, then we can go into committee, and debate it there. I appeal to gentlemen, then, inasmuch as the Speaker's table is crowded with business, and the committees have not been called for reports for weeks, that the House will close this debate at this time. I took the floor to call for the previous question; but my colleague [Mr. WINSLOW] expresses a wish to address the House, and I refrain from doing so in courtesy to him. I hope, when he has concluded, the House will take some course to bring us to a vote.

Mr. WINSLOW obtained the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I reported this resolution from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I have been anxious to hear every gentleman who wished to speak on the question, before I made any remarks myself. I hope the House will take no action that shall cut me off from making the remarks I desire to present.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope my colleague will call for the previous question, when he has concluded. If the gentleman reported the resolution, he will be entitled to his hour.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I think that if anybody is entitled to courtesy for the floor it is myself, who so seldom intrude upon the attention of the House, as gentlemen round me in this Hall will testify. I desire to make a few remarks upon this resolution. Happily for the House, the remarks I shall make upon it shall be brief. And, in the outset, to prevent misunderstanding, I will say that I favor the resolution, and shall vote for it. Nevertheless, justice to the late Secretary of the Navy, to the late board, and to the courts recently assembled, demands that I should say a word in their defense, so far as the transactions under consideration are involved. The reasons which prompt me to vote for the resolution are entirely different from those I have heard advanced in the arguments to which I have listened. I have not heard all the speeches which have been made; and it may be that I will cover ground which has been occupied already.

Mr. Speaker, it has not been denied that some reform was needed in the Navy of the United States. In twenty successive years the successive Secretaries of the Navy have brought the matter to the attention of Congress and entreated its action. I think my friend from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] was in error when he said that the plan of reform which was finally adopted emanated from the late Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary did urge upon Congress that it was imperatively necessary there should be some reform in the Navy; but that proposed by him was of a different character from that which Congress fell upon. To show this necessity, gentlemen will bear with me while I refer to the then existing condition of the Navy. There was always a power in the hands of the President to dismiss from the Navy any officer who was deemed incompetent, or an improper person for the service. There was always in his hands, or that of his Secretary, also the power to furlough any officer whom he thought ought to be furloughed. But when a man was put upon the furloughed list, although permanently relieved of duty, he was not taken from the active list. He remained there to block up the way for promotion for younger and efficient officers. Hence, when a man behaved badly in the Navy, when it was shown that he was incompetent for the discharge of his duty, there was a power in the Secretary of the Navy and the President to set him aside. After he was set aside his junior could not rise to his rank. He would have to perform the duty of the superior rank, without getting either the honor or the emoluments attached to it.

I regret to have to state what really was the condition of the Navy at the period of time of which we are speaking. Gentlemen will be startled when I tell them that, from 1840 to 1854, a period of fourteen years, one hundred and fourteen officers were court-martialed for charges ranging from drunkenness to scandalous conduct, unworthy of the public service and destructive of good morals. One tenth of the post captains, one tenth of the commanders, and one sixth of all your lieutenants, were, during that period, put upon their trials; and of the one hundred and fourteen accused, there were only eighteen acquittals. The condition of the Navy at that time truly called for reform. The reform asked for by the late Secretary of the Navy was, that Congress should intrust the President and himself, with the concurrence of the Senate, with power to dismiss or to furlough, and to set aside the furloughed, so that the juniors and efficient officers might be entitled to promotion. That was the plan which ought to have been adopted. Congress fell upon another plan, which led to the organization of the naval retiring board. I had not the honor of a seat here when that bill was under consideration. It is probable that I might have voted for it. I would have voted for it with great hesitation. A board of proscription I will always distrust. I have some historical reminiscences, and remember to have read of a board which met upon the Island of Mutina, in Italy. There were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus. There was much of giving and taking—what in backwood parlance, in North Carolina, is called log-rolling. When it was said to Lepidus, “your brother, too, must die—consent you, Lepidus?” he replies, “on the condition Publius shall not live, who is your sister’s son, Mark Antony.” To which Antony amiably replies: “He shall not live; look, with a spot I damn him.”

Now, sir, I do not mean to say that this board of fifteen did anything of this kind. I believe they were gentlemen of very high character. I believe they were selected by as pure a man as God ever made—one to whom Nature had been prodigal of all those gifts which adorn our nature—the late Secretary of the Navy, who, I believe, had but one purpose during all his administrative career, and that was to reform the Navy, and make it indeed what it ought to be—a Navy worthy of the Republic. But, sir, the fact that such things might take place, owing to the frailty and weakness of poor human nature, gave occasion to the captious and malevolent to insinuate bad motives and impure purposes; and the course of the debate which took place in the Senate last year, and which has taken place here to-day, the crimination and recrimination which have been indulged in show that this occasion was seized upon and these insinuations were indulged in.

Well, sir, the board met under the law. Two hundred and one persons were removed entirely, or ordered from the active-service list to the retired or to the furlough list. This has produced a great clamor throughout the country. Are you surprised at it? All reforms produce clamor, and all great reformers fall victims to their reformations, until the unerring judgment of time does them tardy, but ultimate, justice. The ax of reform, in this case, fell deep, and so many felt its keen edge, that a clamor was raised throughout the country. There is no doubt that the board had committed errors. Of all men in the world, the officers of the Navy are the least qualified to discharge judicial functions. There is no position in the world that so contracts the mind. With them, contempt of law and lawyers is proverbial. They scorn and condemn anything like the technicalities and formalities of the law, the safeguard of the citizen, and set up their own weak, erring judgment as an infallible guide. Had this thing been done by a board composed of civilians, probably not half the clamor would have been raised about it. But the thing was done, and it is not in view of arguments drawn from the conduct of the board, either good or bad, that we are to pass upon the merits of this resolution. When the bill to organize courts of inquiry came before the Naval Committee of the House last session, it was opposed by my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Naval Committee, [Mr. BOCKOCK,] and myself, and we introduced a substitute for it, which was almost in the very words of this resolution. The Secretary of the Navy said there had been errors. The President said there had been errors. It was admitted on all hands that there had been errors. In the nature of things, there could not have been a great many, for of the two hundred and one cases upon which the board passed, the judgments in one hundred and fifty were unanimous, in thirty-three cases the judgment passed by a majority of more than two thirds, and in the residue by majorities ranging from a plurality to two thirds. But everybody admitted that there had been errors. I thought then that the best mode of settling the matter would be to put the whole power in the hands of the President and the Secretary of the Navy, and let them ascertain where injustice had been done. There had been twelve or thirteen vacancies in the Navy, and the Administration had not filled those vacancies because they were prepared to nominate to the Senate for reinstatement, gentlemen who had been dropped by the board. In order to show that such were the views of the late Secretary of the Navy—views which are confirmatory of the propriety of the present resolution—I ask to have read a short extract from his letter to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

“The first is to let the vacancies occurring by deaths, resignations, or dismissals, be filled by such of the reserved or dropped officers as the Executive, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may deem it just and proper to restore, instead of making promotions from the active list, which have been very considerable under the law, and may well be temporarily suspended by the Executive until such restorations are made as may be adjudged just, and for the good of the service. There are vacancies now. No nominations have been made to fill these, and I may venture to say none will be made for others that may occur, until the President has calmly considered the suggestions presented in regard to some of the officers reserved and dropped. By this means, unless the errors are far more numerous than anticipated, they may be corrected without disturbing the operation of the law, for the President can renominate them to the positions they would have attained had they not been displaced.

“But it may, perhaps, be urged that vacancies may not occur within a reasonable time, so as to make the restorations as prompt as desirable. This, of course, will depend upon the number to be restored. To meet this view, I present for your consideration another plan, which has once been adopted in a case not entirely analogous, but much of the same character. This would require legislative, as well as executive, action. It is to authorize the temporary increase of the number of officers to such a point as will enable the President at once to nominate to the Senate such as it may be considered just and proper to restore; with the proviso, however, that no more commissions be hereafter granted until by deaths, resignations, or removals, the number of officers shall have been reduced to the present number allowed by law.”

Mr. WINSLOW. Now, sir, that was the policy proposed by the chairman of the Naval Committee and myself; that we should pass a law giving power to the President and Secretary of the Navy to fill the vacancies that had occurred by nominations to the Senate, from among those persons who might, in their opinion, have been aggrieved by the action of the board. And in order to do ample justice, we went still further; we did not desire to confine him to the filling of vacancies, but provided that the Navy might be temporarily increased for this purpose. The majority of the Naval Committee took a different view of the matter, and although they gave us an opportunity of introducing the substitute, they moved the previous question, and would not allow us to argue it; and so we declined to introduce it. And now this resolution comes in in almost the same language. The whole influence of the officers of the Navy was brought to bear last session in favor of the bill which was passed. They then refused to accept the measure of relief which we thought was the best remedy, but now, dissatisfied with the action of the courts of inquiry, they come here and ask for the very measure we then proposed. The question with me is, whether I am to be driven by this course into refusing now to do what I thought ought to have been done then. But believing it to be proper then, I believe it to be proper now. I believe that no man in the naval or military service of the country ought ever to be deprived of his position except by a solemn trial by his peers. I have been much struck with a remark upon this subject made by a great writer, himself well acquainted with the Navy, and once an officer in that branch of the service. “I do not think,” said he, “that any military man ought to be deprived of his commission, except under very extreme circumstances, unless by solemn trial and judgment founded upon the finding of a court of his peers. His profession is the business of his life, and his conduct is at all times subjected to a severe and searching ordeal, and dismissal always implies disgrace.”

It may be said that courts composed of their peers have passed judgment upon the cases of these officers; but, Mr. Speaker, it has always been understood, under our Government, that the record of judgment of no court sitting under authority of law should ever be final, unless it has the approval of the Commander-in-Chief. And it ought to be so, sir. No man ought to be subject to the judgment of a court composed of his brother officers, for they are but human, and subject to all the weaknesses and frailties of our nature. Interest, misguided judgment, warped and biased feelings, may sometimes induce them to do wrong; and there ought to be some higher tribunal to pass finally upon their judgments.

Now, sir, how was it with this law? Whenever the court found in favor of an officer, there the law compelled his case to go before the President for approval. But where the court found against the officer, that finding was conclusive upon him. This is not even-handed justice. I think that the case of the man in whose favor judgment was found, and that of the man against whom judgment was found, should both have gone to the great fountain of justice, the Commander-in-Chief.

These are some of the reasons which determine me to vote for the resolution; not that I think that great injustice has been done. I do not think so. But if any injustice, however small, has been done, let us redress it. Let the measure of justice be full, pressed down, and overflowing. No matter how humble a man may be in the service of his country, let justice be done to him. I fear very much, however, that the notion has got out among naval gentlemen that the Government was made for the Navy, and not the Navy for the Government. I remember that before the naval committee, last session, there came in a memorial from some gentleman whose name I fortunately do not recollect, and cannot, therefore, state it if asked, who based his claim to be restored to office on the ground that when he joined as a midshipman, he made a contract with the Government to be binding during life; that he was to serve the Government during his life, and that the Government was to pay him during his life; and that, having performed his part of the contract, the Government was bound to perform its part. I repeat, that I would do him and every man justice; but I would so do it as to give every officer of the Navy, from the senior captain at the head of the service to the meanest cabin-boy, to understand that the Government was not made for the Navy, but the Navy for the Government.

This resolution, in all its scope, can do very little mischief, and may be productive of some good. It may bring some worthy men back, and it may also bring back some unworthy men. There were two hundred and one persons retired from the active list of the Navy by the action of the first board. About one half of those applied to be reinstated. Of those who so applied, not two thirds were restored. This resolution only affects the other one third, on whose cases the second board acted unfavorably. It may increase the list of Navy officers somewhat, for a while at least; but I fear nothing can ever renovate or reform the Navy until it be entirely reconstructed. I fear wounds have been dealt upon it which will never cicatrize. Still, if injustice has been done to a single man, let us give him redress.

Sir, I confess to a great sympathy for the Navy. I feel a lively concern in everything that touches its honor or affects its interest, and I would cheerfully do everything in my power to advance the one and maintain the other. I can never forget that Preble and Paul Jones, and Hull and Decatur, and Morris and Stewart, and their compatriots, illustrated the glory of our arms upon the seas, and gained for themselves imperishable renown. I read the history of our country during the war, in which, for the second time, it dared the might and strength and power of England; and I turn with pride and pleasure from those pages which record our early misfortunes on the western frontier, where defeat followed disaster in quick succession, from the page which records that the foot of the enemy polluted the sacred precincts of the very Capitol, to the leaves which tell of the brilliant exploits of our seamen on the ocean. To this day no man can tell the moral effect of those victories which broke the prestige of England's invincibility on the waters, revived the desponding and drooping energies of the people throughout the country, and dispersed the clouds which had gathered around our early military organization. From that time forth the stars have brightly burned, undimmed and lustrous, in their steady progress to the meridian of their glory. Under the administration of these men the flag of the Republic has been carried in every quarter of the civilized world, and to the icy barriers of the circumpolar seas; and wherever it has gone, they have gained respect for themselves and admiration for your institutions. The red cross of England has blushed deeper, and the white lilies of France have paled beneath their prowess. Sir, we cannot be too grateful to those men; and though this measure may allow half a dozen unworthy men to be restored to the Navy, still it may allow one worthy man to be restored; and although it may impose upon the Treasury some additional burden, still, in memory of their past services, which have shed such luster and glory on our flag, which have raised our country in the estimation of the world, I would not let that interfere with my support of this resolution. I base my support of it on the simple naked question that no military board in the country ought to pass final judgment, unless that judgment is to be reviewed by the Commander-in-Chief. The bill that was passed last session took away from officers this right. Gentlemen in favor of the bill, and the chairman of the Naval Committee himself, saw the omission, but were deterred from amending the bill through the fear that by the amendment the bill might be lost in the last hours of the session.

While I do not defend altogether and throughout the action of the board, still I think that a reform was necessary. While I think they have cut too deep, still I think it is better than if they had not cut at all. I support now the position that I supported then, and that I will under all circumstances support; and that is, never to give power to any board, either Army or Navy, to take final action, unless such action be referred to the Executive for approval or rejection.

Mr. SEWARD. I give notice now, at the commencement of my speech, that I shall move the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the gentleman's notice?

Mr. SEWARD. I would say, with all due respect to the gentleman from Virginia, that he having been for a great many years on the floor, and having been heard very frequently, he ought not to claim that I should withhold a motion for the previous question to allow him to speak, although other young members on the floor, who have not been heard on this subject, might be entitled to such courtesy.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It was out of courtesy to the gentleman that I lost the floor yesterday. I gave way that he might submit a motion which he expressed a desire to submit, to postpone action. I will profit by the precedent hereafter.

Mr. SEWARD. I did not understand the gentleman as extending to me that courtesy; but I will let the House settle the question in regard to the previous question, if I call it at all.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to have, if possible, the attention of the House in regard to this question; because the principles themselves, disconnected from the effect of it upon the complaining officers of the Navy, ought to be settled, and settled correctly, by this House. In the Thirty-Third Congress, the bill which they call the reform bill was passed by this House, under the previous question, without discussion. It was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bocock,] who has made a speech to-day in opposition to the position which I shall endeavor to maintain. It was warned into existence by him; it is his own creature; and I do not wonder that the gentleman should stand by it.

I do not complain of the sensitiveness of the gentleman from Virginia on this subject, because the condemnation of this country upon the act of 1855 was a condemnation of the legislative conduct of that gentleman, who introduced that bill into this House, and had it passed under the previous question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would be a curious matter of information to myself if the honorable gentleman would enlighten me as to how and in what manner that bill was manufactured; whether it emanated from the committee itself, whether it was manufactured in the Navy Department, or whether it was the creature of this very board of fifteen which applied the knife to two hundred of their brethren in the Navy? Well, sir, the work has been done. The gentleman from Virginia says it was not a judicial act of theirs. Now, I ask the gentleman from Virginia whether it was not, in fact, a judicial act by which two hundred men were displaced from the public service? Such was the action of that board, that Congress found itself absolutely incompetent, under any power possessed by them, under the Constitution, to afford full and adequate relief to the parties who had been condemned. Hence the necessity of the act of 1857; and that act in itself shows that the Thirty-Fourth Congress thought it did not have the power, in defiance of the Executive, to remedy the mischief.

Now, sir, how did these two hundred men who had come under the condemnation of the naval board present themselves before these courts of inquiry? I beg to call the attention of gentlemen to the opinion of the Attorney General upon this subject, to show that these men, when they came before these courts of inquiry, came there as their own accusers, and put their own reputations in issue, and that they were called upon, not to defend their own reputations when assailed, but to establish the affirmative proposition that they were morally, mentally, physically, and professionally competent to discharge all the duties required of them. So that the judgment of the board of fifteen was a judicial decision which put them out of the service, and put upon them the burden of coming into court and establishing their own character—that character which they had torn from them in advance. The Attorney General, in giving his opinion in regard to the manner in which these trials should be conducted before the courts of inquiry, says:

"I apprehend, however, that the necessary course of proceeding on the part of any officer, whose case may undergo investigation, will dispose of most of the debatable points in this relation. He must begin by producing evidence, of some sort, to the point of his alleged fitness; and thus, according to all the authorities, he will open the inquiry, not only of character as a personal fact, but also as a fact in estimation, that is, reputation. In the evidence which he offers there cannot fail to be some of this nature."

Why, sir, I submit that there is not a member of this House, I care not how pure his character may be, if you will subject him to the same test, and impose upon him the same obligations to establish that character which were imposed by these courts, who will not that instant find persons having interests in conflict with his, who can hunt up, in social life, some charge, some accusation made by some enemy, to strike down his character. He, being placed upon the affirmative, to build up his character, is placed at a disadvantage which he cannot overcome by reason of the character of the evidence on which he must rely. Why, Mr. Speaker, this was a sort of spiritual court. Why, they investigated the moral character of these men. In one of the records which I have looked into, I find that a high character was absolutely stricken down for taking round a social board, six or seven years ago, a glass of wine punch, by which he became to some extent intoxicated. I refer to Lieutenant Harrison. The only charge against him was the one I have named, and which he admitted. His subsequent life and his prior life was as spotless—I venture the assertion—as that of any gentleman in the Navy. If the members of this House were tried by the same rule, it is likely that some of us might suffer from a similar investigation, for it is a weakness under which some of us may fall. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this has been called a great work of reform. We have been told that the Navy has been immensely benefited by it. Admit it. It may be said that more good than mischief has been done. Well, sir, if that be true, the gentleman from Virginia admitted that there were some errors committed in carrying it out, which were corrected partially by the legislation of the last Congress. Then, why not, under this resolution, carry out the work, and correct the balance of the mischief, and allow full justice to be done to these parties? Who is to be injuriously affected by this resolution? None but those in high places, and in the enjoyment of high compensation. And that, sir, is what has given rise to all the mischief. It has been a struggle to displace some men in the Navy that others might be promoted. The whole difficulty began at that particular point, and has been continued from that particular time. Well, sir, the act of 1857 looked to curing the mischief which, as I said, grew out of the decisions of the naval board under the act of 1855. The act contemplated the relief of the Navy from the difficulties in which it had found itself in an increase of officers, and provided for the restoration of such of the officers displaced under the act of 1855 as the courts of inquiry might recommend. The second section of the act is as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the operation of the present law limiting the number of officers of the Navy shall be suspended so far as to authorize the restoration, within one year from the passage of this act, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of officers reserved or dropped under the operation of the act of the 28th of February, 1855, entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.' Provided, That there shall be no further promotions or appointments in any grade, after said restorations shall have been made thereto, until such grade in the active service shall be reduced to the limit now prescribed by law. That when any such officer shall be restored to the Navy, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the officer so restored shall occupy that position and rank in the Navy which he would have held had he not been retired, furloughed, or dropped, by the order of the President, on the report of the naval board: Provided, further. That any dropped officer who may be, in the opinion of said court, entitled to be placed on the retired or furloughed list, may be thus placed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

There were one hundred and nine applications for relief to the courts of inquiry; nine of these were withdrawn. On the final verdict thirty-three were restored to the active list; and from the furloughed list, thirty-nine were advanced to the reserved list; leaving only forty-nine of the number where they were under the decision of the naval board. Thus, nearly two thirds of the decisions of that board were overruled, and we have more than cause to suspect that even a greater number of errors were committed. Why, sir, when these men were sent before the courts of inquiry, they were looked upon as if they had been applicants for place in the Naval Academy, or at West Point, and their characters were put in issue as though they never had been connected with the Navy. Notwithstanding this, however, two thirds of the decisions of the naval board were reversed.

What does the resolution contemplate? The resolution upon your table, Mr. Speaker, proposes to allow the President of the United States to examine the records made up by the courts of inquiry; and that where, in his opinion, the record presents a case which entitles a party suffering from the decision of a court to relief, that the President may recommend his appointment, subject to the ratification of the Senate of the United States. What mischief can ensue from the resolution? In the first place, the President of the United States revises the record, looks into all of the facts, and, if he believes the judgment of the court of inquiry was wrong, then he may nominate the party to the Senate. There the character of the party undergoes an investigation; and if he is morally, mentally, physically, or professionally unfit, he will not be confirmed by the Senate. No man pretends to vindicate the action of the naval retiring board in trying these parties by no law except that existing in their own bosom, and resulting from their own imagination. There is no record showing that action; and the only living witness that such a board ever existed, is that some two hundred and one men are abroad in the land, branded with infamy by it.

It was said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGOCCK] that since the introduction of this measure into Congress, persons affected by the board of fifteen, under the act of 1855, or by the courts of inquiry, had haunted this Capitol, and asked for the passage of this resolution. The gentleman should remember that when the original act was passed, the officers who have been benefited under it were daily flocking around the Hall, and they were not kept out. They took seats upon the floor of the House of Representatives. They constantly pressed the passage of the measure. After they had polled the House, and ascertained their strength, and knew that they could carry the bill, it was passed without debate, under the previous question. I happened to watch the machinery then at work, and it was operated by some who wished to get rid of some honorable men, that they themselves might be promoted. They succeeded; and from that day to this, Mr. Speaker, there has been a struggle here, and a struggle in the Navy, and in every department of the Government, to correct the evil which followed. We have been doing it, step by step, in changing the act of 1855. We passed the act of 1857; but it was inefficient to accomplish the entire work designed. If we pass this resolution, then these parties may have justice done them; and justice may be done to them without injury to the public service.

Gentlemen have talked about putting these men upon ships and sinking them with sound men. Is it believed that the President of the United States and the Senate, which is a coördinate branch of the executive Government in regard to appointments, would indorse men with bad characters? Is it believed that they would advise the restoration of unsound men to the naval service? Why, sir, the Senate is as competent to look into the character of these men as a court of inquiry, the members of which did not understand the first principles of evidence—a fact which I could demonstrate if I had the time to go into the records. If a court examine into the skill of a medical man, they will take the evidence of medical men; and the only competent evidence of the skill or unskillfulness of a naval officer is that of men in the same profession. But here rumors were taken hold of, and old letters and charges were raked up. The rubbish of ten or twenty years was dragged into court to assail the character of these men before the courts of inquiry. The courts of inquiry numbered one, two, and three. What were they? How do they stand? Will gentlemen say that they were competent to decide these questions? No, sir. Some of them (I do not know how many) were the recipients of the benefits of the act of 1855; and to restore any of these men was to affect themselves. They were incompetent, according to every principle of law; and the great error, in my opinion, was that the Secretary of the Navy selected men from the Navy, instead of civilians having no personal interest in the matter, to pass upon these questions.

But, Mr. Speaker, Secretary Dobbin, upon whose report the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGOCCK] relies for authority, absolutely insisted upon some remedial measure at the hands of Congress for the benefit of these men. The gentleman from Virginia, however, did not have the liberality to read what was said upon that subject; but, lawyer-like, contented himself with reading such portions of the report as suited his views, and omitting to read the residue. What did Secretary Dobbin say upon this subject? He said:

"And while I can by no means recommend the adoption of any measure of repeal, or any course of proceeding in conflict with the general action of the board, I have no doubt that there should be, and will be, found a remedy for any mistake or error of judgment, if the service has been deprived of a meritorious and capable officer, either by reservation or dropping."

Now, sir, there was no record that the President could review of the two hundred and odd cases that were determined by the first board; there was no evidence that the Secretary of the Navy could look to to ascertain whether the board had acted justly or not—none, sir; so that by necessity, from the very character of the law, and the very character of the examination, the President of the United States had either to approve the entire action of the board, or to reject it in toto. The President could not lay his finger upon one of those two hundred and odd men, and say that he had been unjustly treated. There was no record, no evidence; so that, as I said before, the President had either to approve or to reject the entire action of the board; and he took the first of these alternatives, and approved it, without knowing what he did approve. The law compelled the President, in order to carry out this work of reform, to approve of the decision of the board of fifteen upon the characters of all these men, without knowing the basis of the action of that board.

But, sir, we have now got this thing in a tangible shape. We have had a court of inquiry, bad as it was—a court that allowed these men to come in and put their own reputations in issue, on the assumption that they had been disgraced, and called upon them to bring in proof to prop up those reputations. The ordinary legal rule is, that every man is presumed to be innocent until the contrary appears; but these men were, from necessity, brought before the court upon the assumption that they were all incompetent, from moral causes, or from some mental defect, or some physical infirmity, or because they had disgraced themselves professionally. Well, now, from this court we have a record—a record in sixty-nine cases—and I submit, in fairness and justice, to this House, if it is not right and proper and sound legislation that we should allow the President to review these records, and wherever, in his opinion, injustice has been done, to recommend the restoration of the officer, subject to confirmation by the Senate, even though it may increase the expenses of the Government? We have been told by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGOCCK] that $50,000 has been added to the expenses of the Navy by the restorations which have already taken place under the action of the courts of inquiry of 1857. Now, sir, the gentleman ought to have turned to the other side of the account. How much money, I would ask, has been spent in trying to redress the wrongs of these men? I venture to assert that the misstep of the Naval Committee, and the improper action of the Thirty-Third Congress, under the, in my judgment, very bad recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, has cost this Government millions of dollars. It will not do for gentlemen to say that it was sound legislation, and that the Navy required reform. The action of the naval board, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and the legislation of the Thirty-Third Congress, have been put on trial before the American people, and they stand condemned, and will so stand to the end of time. Millions of the public money have been spent in order to redeem the broken reputations and crushed spirits of these men who have thus been trampled upon by unjust legislation, and by the interference of officers in the Navy who desired to make way for their own future promotion.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this Navy bill of 1855 was the result of a fundamental error in the legislation of this whole country. This, sir, is a Government of clerks. Edicts are issued at the Departments; and, through the rules of this House organizing your committees, the legislative power of this country is paralyzed, and the true representative character of members upon this floor is stricken down. You are trampled at every step in your legislation by the complication of your rules. Under the custom and habit which prevail here, the members of the committees write to and receive letters from the Departments, which are manufactured by clerks there, no one knowing what outside influences are brought to bear upon them; and the edicts of these clerks are carried out here sometimes by the force of party drill of whichever party may be in power; and hence our legislation has become vitiated at every step. It is a great evil in this country; and this act of 1855 will stand as a monument of the error, of the wrong, and of the mischief done by looking to the Departments to see what is our duty to the country. Sir, I hope the time will come when the attention of the people of this country will be called to it, and that they will see to it that this iniquitous system of legislation is broken down.

We have got too many bureaus. This bill of 1855 emanated from some bureau or other. But the mischief has been done. Shall we apply the remedy? The patient is sick; we want the medicine applied; and it is found in the resolution. I know but one or two officers in the Navy. I do not want to know officers; all I want to know is that they do their duty. So long as I have a seat on this floor, I shall not stop to inquire who or what a man is, or where he came from. I will put him on trial upon the same process as I claim for myself. I will try him by no other rule; and as I would have justice measured out to me under the law, so I will give it to the humblest member of society, in any part of the Union. Talk about the Administration! I do not look upon this as an Administration measure or as an anti-Administration measure. I do not know what political feelings any of those men who seek to be restored have. I do not want to know. But I want to give all of them the right to go before the court of appeals—as it has been termed—before the President of the United States, and have their cases reviewed. And if injustice or wrong has been done to them, let the remedy be applied; let their name and reputation be relieved from the curse and odium put upon them, and let the men be restored to their position.

Men who have been educated in the Army or Navy are, as we all know, from their training and habits, entirely unfit for other business. What do they know about any other business than that which they were taught to understand from their youth up? Gentlemen say, if we pass this resolution, we may restore forty-nine officers to the Navy. Suppose we do, Mr. Speaker? If it is right, put the whole of them back, though it should cost the Government fifty or one hundred thousand dollars. If forty-nine of these men stand condemned unjustly by the unrighteous decision of a court, organized as these courts were organized, under the acts of 1855 and 1857, let them be restored to their good name and to their former position. But I take it for granted that there are very few of these men who will be restored. I have seen the applications of two or three, that have been prepared, in the event of the passage of this resolution. I know but few who intend to apply; and, looking at the records of their particular cases, I am satisfied that they are entitled to the remedy provided by this resolution, and that an act of injustice will be done by Congress if it does not pass it. In the other branch of Congress, it was passed by a majority of sixteen. There were, I think, thirty in favor of the resolution, to fourteen against it. That is pretty decisive, especially when the Senate committee had examined into the matter, and investigated some of these cases, and the evidence on which they were decided.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] said he wanted to make a speech. I think that enough has been said on this subject; and I believe that I should call the previous question. If the House is not willing to sustain it, I do not care. I therefore demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table now?

A MEMBER. What for?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. To bring the resolution before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it would be in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, I make that motion.

Mr. SEWARD. That motion was made yesterday, and decided in the negative.

The SPEAKER. Debate has intervened since. The gentleman will perceive that the reason of the rule is this: debate having been held on the main proposition, the House may change its determination with regard to the matter.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I want to know what the motion to reconsider is? Is it to bring the bill out of the committee before the House?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on reconsidering the vote by which the House referred the joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If that motion prevails, the question will then recur on the motion, shall the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And if voted down, the vote will be directly on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be on the resolution before the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the motion to reconsider will not be voted down.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I hope it will.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope it will, with a view to having the resolution amended.

Mr. SEWARD. I beg leave most respectfully to suggest to the Chair, that, the motion to reconsider being a privileged question under the rules of the House, the vote having been taken on the motion to lay on the table, and it having been decided in the negative, the same motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table cannot now be entertained a second time by the Chair.

Mr. MILLSON. As a question of order, I ask whether the Chair has not already decided, this session, that a motion to lay on the table, or a motion to reconsider, cannot be repeated when the subject to be laid on the table is in the same legislative condition?

The SPEAKER. Debate has been held.

Mr. MILLSON. Does that affect its legislative position?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would dislike to rule in such a way as to preclude the House from voting on a proposition to terminate a question, after debate had been had upon it.

Mr. MILLSON. As the House is thin, I move a call of the House before the question is put.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at this time, would not this matter come up to-morrow as the regular business?

The SPEAKER. The resolution would come up the first business in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, in order to save the time of calling the House, I hope the gentleman will give way to allow me to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This being a question of reconsideration, if the House adjourn it can be called up at any other time.

Mr. MILLSON. I withdraw, for that purpose, my motion for a call of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. There is a privileged motion already before the House. That is a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate resolution No. 3 was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I want to know how, after the previous question was called, the gentleman from Pennsylvania got the floor to move a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not perceive any difficulty at all in the way of the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Such a motion has been constantly entertained ever since I have occupied a seat on this floor.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well. I know the decision has been often the other way.

Mr. QUITMAN. I want to present this question of order to the Chair: whether, when the consideration of a bill was fixed for a particular day, as the Army bill was fixed for to-day, can the rules be suspended without general consent? If I am permitted, I object to the suspension of the rules, as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLSON. As the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table will involve two additional votes by the House, I appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the motion, and allow the previous question to be seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Very well; I will withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I renew it.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 127; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Bingham, Bliss, Bockock, Brayton, Case, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Cragin, James Craig, Burton Craige, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Greenwood, Harlan, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Jenkins, George W. Jones, Keitt, John C. Kunkel, Letcher, Mason, Miller, Morgan, Olin, Pettit, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Wade, and Zollicoffer—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bishop, Bonham, Bowie, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cockrell, Covode, Cox, Crawford, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Horton, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Milton, Montgomery, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Ready, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—124.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, being taken, the motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the motion to refer, and demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suggest to the gentleman, that before he moves the previous question, he allow me to put in an amendment; and allow the sense of the House to be taken upon it.

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask that my amendment may be read for information.

Mr. SEWARD. Debate is out of order, and I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not want to debate it.

Mr. SEWARD. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, sir, I hope the House will vote down the demand.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 85, noes 44; and the previous question ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SEWARD called for the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BLAIR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The resolution was again read.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Avery, Billingshurst, Bonham, Bowie, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockrell, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Farnsworth, Florence, Gartrell, Goode, Granger, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Horton, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Milton, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Savage, Scott, Searing, Seward, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bockock, Brayton, Cobb, Colfax, Burton Craige, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dodd, Durfee, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Garnett, Gilmer, Greenwood, Harlan, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Jenkins, George W. Jones, John C. Kunkel, Letcher, Mason, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Pettit, Phelps, Ritchie, Ruffin, Sandidge, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William Stewart, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Wade, and Zollicoffer—51.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. SEWARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW REGIMENT BILL.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is the consideration of House bill No. 313, to provide for the organization of a new regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers.

And then, on motion of Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE, (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. B. F. BITTINGER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Nebraska, in favor of an appropriation for the purpose of bridging the Great Platte or Nebraska river at some point within fifty miles of its mouth; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON. I have received a number of petitions from persons engaged in the iron business in Pennsylvania, who state that that business is very much embarrassed. The petition I have in my hand is signed by the workmen of a single iron establishment in the county of Huntingdon. They say that more than two million dollars are invested in the business immediately in their neighborhood, and that it is all prostrated now in consequence of the legislation of the country; and they desire some relief. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON also presented a petition of citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, praying that sufficient protection may be extended to that branch of American labor engaged in the manufacture of iron; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STUART presented a petition of citizens of Lockport, New York, and two petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for the construction of a harbor of refuge at New Buffalo, Michigan; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLEN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in favor of an act granting public lands to the several States and Territories, to aid and encourage scientific education in agriculture and the mechanic arts; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of John Wightman, praying that the Postmaster General may be authorized to vary the terms of his contract for carrying the mail in conformity with the principles of equity and justice; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Ebenezer Ricker, praying to be allowed a pension on account of a wound received in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, in favor of the distribution of a portion of the public lands among the several States for educational purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented the petition of Jeremiah Pendergast, praying to be allowed additional pay for services as a night-watchman at the Patent Office building; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of the General Assembly of Iowa, praying for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail from Des Moines, in that State, to White Cloud, in the Territory of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House has passed the resolution of the Senate (No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President, under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'an act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,' in respect to dropped and retired naval officers."

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. TOOMBS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States as relates to the subject of "a uniform bankrupt law," be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred two petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, in relation to grants of land to actual settlers in Arizona, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 139) amendatory of the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855, reported it without amendment, and that the bill ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 157) to provide for the payment to the State of Missouri of two per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands therein, heretofore reserved under a compact with said State, reported it without amendment.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill reported from the Court of Claims, December 10, 1857, for the relief of Charner T. Scaife, administrator of Gilbert Stalker, with the opinion of the court in favor of the claim, reported the bill (S. No. 183) without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill reported from the Court of Claims, the 12th of May, 1856, for the relief of John Robb, with the opinion of the court in favor of the claim, reported the bill (S. No. 184) with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 2) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital at San Francisco, California, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a paper relating to the claim of C. J. Fox, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John C. F. Salamon and George W. Morris, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 4) to authorize writs of error in all cases prosecuted by indictment, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws, submitted a report accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That Minnesota is not a State of the Union, under the Constitution and laws.

The report was ordered to be printed.

THOMAS AP CATESBY JONES.

On motion, by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones. It directs the proper accounting officers to allow to him the pay of which he was deprived by the decision of a court-martial, in the year 1851, with a proviso that this is not to be construed as an expression of opinion on the organization, conduct, or decision of the court.

Mr. STUART. I ask the Secretary to read the memorial which will present this case.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, a captain in the Navy of the United States, respectfully sheweth, that in the winter of 1850-51, shortly after his recall from command of our squadron on the Pacific and California coasts, he was tried by a naval court-martial, which held its session at the navy-yard, in this city; and that the sentence was "five years' suspension, the first two and a half years without pay or emolument." This severe sentence was passed, as your memorialist verily believes, and is well assured by several distinguished jurists familiar with court-martial practice, on testimony essentially defective, even to the admission of "ex parte" evidence, as the official record of the court attests; and on which your memorialist was justly entitled to full and honorable acquittal. For these and other good and substantial reasons your memorialist prayeth that your honorable body will take his case of great hardship into favorable consideration, and authorize restitution of the pay of which he has been wrongfully deprived, through the mistake of the court, from the 18th day of February, 1851, to the 22d day of February, 1853.

Your memorialist most respectfully begs leave to refer your honorable body to the accompanying letter, (No. 3) which may be considered as the first direct action of his Excellency President Fillmore, on his sentence. This action was voluntary on the part of the Executive; and the kind terms used by the Hon. Mr. Kennedy, Secretary of the Navy, in communicating the President's remission of the unexpired term of the sentence, affords just ground for supposing that the President, as well as Mr. Kennedy, considered the sentence of your memorialist as one of unmerited severity.

And your memorialist, as in duty bound, will ever pray.
THOS. AP C. JONES.

No. 3.—Letter referred to in the foregoing petition:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 23, 1853.

SIR: It gives me much pleasure to inform you that the President, upon a consideration of your case as represented to him by the Department, has been pleased to direct that the residue of the term of your suspension, to which you were sentenced by a naval general court-martial, in February, 1850, be remitted, and that you be "restored to the service."

This remission will take effect from the 22d instant, from which date you will consider yourself as waiting orders.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN P. KENNEDY.

Commodore THOMAS AP CATESBY JONES, United States Navy, Prospect Hill, Virginia.

The foregoing is an exact copy of the original memorial presented late in the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, but not acted on till the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, when, after full debate, the Senate passed bill No. 481, which, although it received the sanction of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives, was not acted upon by the House of Representatives, for the want of time.

THOS. AP CATESBY JONES.

All the papers to which reference is made in the foregoing memorial, are now on file in the House of Representatives.
JONES.

WASHINGTON, December 2, 1856.

Mr. STUART. It certainly affords me no pleasure to oppose a claim of this character, here or elsewhere; but, sir, my convictions are perfectly clear that the relief which is asked for by the memorialist in this case is beyond the constitutional authority of Congress to give; and I shall ask the attention of the Senate for a very few minutes, while I present the considerations which occur to me.

The memorialist states that by a court-martial held at the navy-yard in this city some years ago, he was tried upon certain charges, and by that court-martial convicted. He sets out that that court-martial received improper evidence, even extending, he says, to ex parte testimony; that they rendered an unnecessarily severe judgment against him, which judgment was that he should be suspended five years, two years and a half of which were to be without pay. He says that on the case being reviewed by the President, in virtue of his constitutional authority, (in which review it will be conceded by all he had the power to remit the entire sentence if he chose,) he decided to remit one half of the suspension, or the remaining term of suspension. The memorialist, for the reasons which he assigns, in the first place, that the court received improper evidence, and in the next place, that they visited on him too severe a judgment, asks Congress to interpose. The President having remitted one part of the judgment, he asks that Congress shall remit the remainder, by allowing him two and a half years' pay.

There I make the point that Congress has no authority whatever to interpose and modify this judgment of the court-martial, and that it would have no such authority if the President had not acted at all, the Constitution being clear that all power to pardon, or to remit fines or penalties, belongs to the President, and the President alone. But, sir, here is a case where the President has been called upon to exercise this constitutional authority; and he has exercised it, and decided that he will do no more than remit the residue of the suspension. It seems to me that this case is too clear for argument. I know that it has been presented before—presented in the hurry of legislation. I know the difficulty there is in considering a question of this kind in the Senate, at any time. That difficulty exists now, and always will exist; but if there be any one thing under this Government more important than another, it is that each department shall keep itself clearly and distinctly within its own jurisdiction; that the legislative department shall not encroach, in the least degree, upon the duties which belong appropriately to the executive or judicial departments, and so of them.

I am aware that it is sought to be said that we merely pay this man the money; that we do not undertake to interfere with the judgment of the court; and that the bill has got a very mild proviso attached to it, declaring that this act shall not be construed as passing any opinion whatever on the propriety of the decision of the court-martial; but the bill itself is a direct interference with the judgment of the court—overruling it. Can this be disputed? What is it, I ask—and I call the attention of Senators to it—that prevents Captain Jones from receiving this two and a half years' salary now? It is the judgment of the court-martial depriving him of it. If Congress passes a bill to pay it to him, does not Congress interfere with the judgment? Can this dilemma be escaped by any sort of reasoning, or attempt at reasoning? It seems to me not. I repeat, the only thing that stands in the way of his claiming at the Treasury Department now this two and a half years' pay, is that he has been deprived of it by the judgment of a court-martial. Then, when Congress directs it to be paid to him, it certainly is a direct interference with, and overturning of, that judgment. Is that within our power? I think not.

I submit, Mr. President, that the very fact that this is not a large amount constitutes a reason for the careful consideration of the subject to-day. You may settle a great principle much better when the amount involved is small than when it is large. A court, of competent jurisdiction, by its judgment deprives a man of his pay for two years and a half on account of offenses against the service. Congress steps in and refunds him the money. What has been the effect of the trial? Suppose the only judgment that had been passed was to deprive him of two and a half years' pay, and Congress refunds it, I ask, again, what is the effect of the judgment? Nothing. The President had the power to remit the entire sentence. Upon a careful consideration of the case, he decided that he would do no more than remit the remainder of the sentence, and shorten the time of suspension; that that was all that mercy required at his hands. Now Congress is called upon to remit the remainder, and it is sought to modify it sufficiently by declaring that this is not to be construed as passing any opinion upon the propriety of the judgment. Why, sir, you cannot attach to it any such condition. You are obliged to say that the judgment was wrong; or else upon what ground do you remit the sentence and pay the money?

These are, as briefly as I could state them, the insurmountable objections which occur to my mind on the reading of this bill. So far as this officer is concerned I do not desire, even by inference, to be understood as saying aught against him. Personally, to me he is an entire stranger. His history in his younger days is not a stranger to me, nor I to it. He has done good service to his country; but so has many another man, who finally committed an offense against the laws of his country, and been punished for it. That seems to be this case, and it appears to me to be beyond our power to furnish him any remedy.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I am glad to find that the honorable Senator from Michigan has, on one occasion at least—I do not know that it has been my good fortune, since I have been associated with him, to know of any other—exhibited an inclination of his mind to a strict construction of the Constitution; because I understand it is on constitutional grounds altogether that he opposes this bill. I have known instances where it has been the conviction of my mind that the Constitution has been subjected almost to lawless violence under construction placed upon it by that honorable Senator. But I think, in the present instance, he has failed to show, to any extent whatever, that the proposed action of Congress in appropriating this money for the purpose designed by this bill, interferes even in a technical form with the requirements of the Constitution.

The honorable Senator says that the court having competent authority imposed, as a part of the punishment upon the officer, that he should be suspended from active service for five years, and deprived of pay for half that time. The Senator reasons upon the Constitution, that none but the President, having the pardoning power, can, in any manner, directly or indirectly, affect that sentence. I do not trace the intervention of the President to the pardoning power at all; but if I did, I should think the honorable Senator would equally be at fault in his argument. The Constitution of the United States declares only that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons; and so far as clemency is concerned, the whole power is embraced in that phrase, "to grant reprieves and pardons." But the Constitution also says that Congress shall have power to prescribe rules for the government of the Army and Navy, of which the President is made Commander-in-Chief. The exact language is, "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Congress has exercised that power; Congress has declared the mode in which military offenses committed in either branch of the military service, the Army or Navy, shall be examined into by military courts; and Congress has vested in the President the power of reversal over their judgment, as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. The sentence of the court, be it what it may, has no effect at all under that law until it is approved by the President. If the President approves it, it is to go into effect; if he disapproves it, it is null. That power is under the law, as I should take it, prescribing rules for the government of the Army and Navy.

Now, what is the present case? The court martial upon Commodore Jones decided that he should be suspended for five years, and two years and a half of that time without pay. I have not examined the law prescribing the mode in which courts-martial shall be constituted, nor the whole question of the power that is given to the President to affect the sentence of the court; but I am very confident that part of the power is to declare the judgment null if he shall think proper, and it has no effect until he approves it; but in the present case the President approved the sentence of the court, and it went into effect.

Perhaps I am wrong (for I have been presenting this case only as it occurred to my mind) in supposing that the power to remit the sentence resulted from the rules prescribed by Congress for the government of the Army and Navy, and it may be that it is to be traced to the pardoning power. But, be that as it may, that the President possessed the power which he interposed in this instance, I presume even the honorable Senator does not question; he has not questioned it in his argument.

Mr. STUART. I stated that he had it.

Mr. MASON. Very well. He possessed the power. How did he exercise it? He approved the sentence in the first instance, and allowed it to go into effect; and the officer was deprived of his command and his pay. After the sentence had gone into effect, and had its operation for a certain period—I do not remember exactly what, nor is it very material—the President interposed the power which he undoubtedly possessed from some quarter—not to set aside the judgment of the court; he had approved that; the day had gone by in which he could declare the sentence null and void; but he interposed the executive power to remit the further execution of that sentence as far as the executive power extended. How far could it extend? The judgment of the court was a part of the law of the land; and under that law of the land the money, which would have been payable to the officer for his compensation, was withheld at the Treasury and remained there; unappropriated money, beyond all question. Whether it was for one year or two years, or the whole term of two years and a half, I do not now recollect, nor is it material; but, for whatever period, the money withheld by that judgment of the court was withheld by lawful authority, and remained in the Treasury unappropriated, and remains there now. Why? Because, by competent, lawful authority, any previous appropriation of it to pay this officer was repealed and revoked by the sentence. It remained in the Treasury, therefore, unappropriated money.

Now, the honorable Senator says it was in the power of the President, if he thought proper to do so as the only revisory power of a court-martial, to remit the whole penalty. If he means by that assertion that it would be in the power of the President to make his interposition retroactive, and by that to require of the Treasury to pay out this unappropriated money to the officer, I question it entirely. He could not make it retroact; he could not affect money that remained in the Treasury unappropriated; he did all that he could do in revising the judgment of the court; he had before approved it; he had allowed it to take effect; but from considerations which operated on his mind as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and for the good of the public service, it is to be presumed—I doubt not properly exercised in this instance, without revising or annulling the judgment of the court—he remitted the penalty in favor of the officer. Now, I should think the President, in doing that, has shown that, to the extent of his power, this act of interposition was called for by the circumstances of the case. He exhausted his whole power in remitting the unexpired term; but he could not call back the money which had been cut off from the officer by the sentence of the court-martial which became a part of the law of the land.

The honorable Senator says that to pass this bill would be to disapprove and to annul, by the action of Congress, the sentence of the court. Why, Mr. President, would it not be competent for Congress to remit a fine which had been imposed by a court of justice on any offender against the laws? Suppose an offense is committed to which a pecuniary penalty is annexed, as is often the case—the laws frequently punish offenses by pecuniary fines, mulcts. Suppose, under such a law, a fine is imposed; it is collected from the delinquent, and paid into the Treasury; the law has had its full effect; the whole penalty has been paid: does anybody doubt the power of Congress, if circumstances are presented showing that there were reasons, either in regard to former character or public considerations, that should lead them to remit that penalty by refunding the money, to do it, leaving the judgment of the court utterly unaffected, standing precisely as it did before such an act was passed? Is not that the same proposition here? The sentence of the court has been carried into effect, except so far as the President remitted it; it has made its visitation on this officer, and a very heavy visitation it was. What is asked by the officer now is, that Congress will interpose to do what the President was unable to do—to refund to him the money withheld and now in the Treasury unappropriated, and which would have gone to his pay, but for the sentence of the court. The terms of the bill, I think from abundant caution, and abundant caution only, provide that there shall be no misconstruction of it to be drawn into precedent hereafter. It directs that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall allow to Captain Jones the pay of which he was deprived by the decision of a court-martial in 1851. In my judgment, that could never be drawn into precedent as an assumption of authority in Congress to revise or disapprove the judgment of a court; but to save that, the committee have introduced this proviso:

"That this act is not to be construed as an expression of opinion upon the organization, conduct, or decision of said court."

Mr. President, the officer (Captain Jones) for whom this bounty is intended—for it is a bounty on the part of Congress; it is a gratuity on their part; he can derive it only from the interposition of Congress, which has the power of appropriating money—as is known to the history of the country, was amongst the gallant and distinguished naval officers of the last war with England, who rendered services to his country that will carry down his name to posterity as one of the gallant and brave defenders of their country in the war of 1814, when he was a very young man, a lieutenant or a midshipman, I do not know which. We all know the impression that was made on the popular mind by his gallant defense of New Orleans with the gun-boats under his command, on the occasion of the attack on that city. It is a part of the history of the country, recorded on the page of history, that the British were delayed in their landing for several days by Jones and those gun-boats, until General Jackson had completed his military preparations. I speak of that only as an evidence of his gallantry, his courage, and his enterprise, as a young man. It was there he received a wound, which physically disabled him, to a very great extent, in all after life.

Mr. President, we have been in the habit, not only from consideration for the officer himself, but public considerations, to invite, to encourage those who are always ready and prompt to imperil their lives in the cause of the country, by our action here. What is the condition of this officer now? He was set aside by the late board of inquiry for physical disability only—the very wound that he carried upon his person. He is now, as I happen to know, for he has been a cherished and valued friend of mine from my earliest youth, and a native of my own State, lying hopelessly ill within a short distance of this Capitol, very infirm of health from the wound which he has carried about him for a long while; and when he dies, will die, if not leaving his family destitute, under very heavy and very serious embarrassments. That, I confess, has been my reason for taking the bill up out of its order, and in the absence of the honorable Senator who reported it from the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. HALE.] But this bill has twice passed the judgment of the Senate, not in a hurried manner, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Michigan, but after debate, certainly in one instance, if not in both, in which that honorable Senator and myself participated. The honorable

Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] has suggested what, perhaps, may be better—that the bill should contain the usual words, that the money shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. I ask that informal modification be made, and I shall not trouble the Senate longer.

Mr. STUART. I confess, sir, I should have been much better pleased if the honorable Senator from Virginia had consented to discuss this question without undertaking to pay me a very doubtful compliment. He did not allude to the occasions in which he supposed I was making dangerous onslaughts on the Treasury against constitutional authority, and hence has not afforded me an opportunity to show that I was justified. I think if he had specified them, perhaps it would have been found that they were cases in which two thirds and more of the Congress of the United States, after full discussion, agreed with me, so that I might find a justification in that. But I wish to do equal justice to the honorable Senator and to say to him that the only men it has ever been my fortune to meet in Congress whose constructions of the Constitution were so broad that I could not go with them, have been the men who have claimed to be strict constructionists par excellence.

It will be conceded, I think, that the Senate is not the very best place in the world to discuss a question of law, and I am not certain but that it might be equally well conceded that Senators while in their seats here are not the best prepared to discuss them. At all events, in what I am about to say, while I think I am right, I may be in error. I speak from recollection. My recollection of the law is, that a pardon successfully pleaded leaves the case as if the judgment had never been passed. That, I think, is the law. If this be true, then if the President in the exercise of his constitutional authority had remitted the entire judgment, the case would have stood as if the judgment had never been rendered, and Captain Jones could have gone to the Treasury and demanded his pay. Such, I think, upon an examination of the books, will prove to be the case. But, as I said, I speak only from recollection, and therefore do not wish to state it with too much assurance.

Then, sir, it turns out that the history of this case was properly stated by me. There was a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; that judgment was approved by the President; it was subsequently reviewed by him, under his authority to exercise the pardoning power, and a portion of the judgment remitted, to the extent of the last two and a half years of the suspension. It is, therefore, a case executed and complete under that department of the Government having constitutional authority, and having in its possession the entire facts. The Senate is bound to believe that the President has exercised all that clemency which the nature of the service would permit in remitting two and a half years of the judgment of suspension.

Confident as the Senator from Virginia seemed to be that Congress possesses the power to cancel a judgment imposing a fine by a court of competent jurisdiction, I feel it my duty to interpose a respectful denial of that power.

Mr. MASON. I never said Congress could cancel a judgment; but they certainly could repay a fine after it had been paid; the judgment would remain.

Mr. STUART. I certainly desire to state the argument of the Senator as he made it himself. He did say that Congress possessed the power to refund the money. Then what is the effect of the judgment? Of what sort of avail is it for the courts, civil and military, of the United States, under the Constitution, to pass judgments imposing fines and penalties, if Congress possesses the power next day to refund the money? Can it be said that that does not interfere with the judgment? You might as well adopt the argument of the Quaker—that he would not kill the man, neither would he injure him; but he would hold his head under the water until the breath was out of his body. You render the judgment of no possible avail. A judgment pronounces a penalty of $1,000; you refund the money; and that, it is said, does not affect the judgment!

Let us see whether you have the power to refund the money. The Constitution provides that money may be appropriated by Congress out of the Treasury to pay the debts of the Government. I know of no authority that exists, under the Constitution, on the part of Congress to make donations of the public money outright. That seems to be the ground on which the Senator from Virginia puts the bill; but I desire the Senate to remember that the memorialist does not put it on the ground that Congress shall make him a donation of this two and a half years' pay, but he puts it on the ground that the court pronounced an unnecessarily severe judgment against him on ex parte testimony. That is the position on which he bases the claim; but if it be placed on the ground of a donation, I ask the Senator to point me to the clause of the Constitution of the United States which authorizes Congress to make a donation of the public money. I do not deny that there may be great and meritorious services of a citizen which Congress may say authorize them to make compensation; but that is to pay a debt. A man has furnished to the country eminent services of immense value, and Congress may appropriate money out of the Treasury to pay him for this service thus rendered to his country. That is not a donation. It is for a consideration full, valuable, complete. But to appropriate a dollar out of the Treasury as a matter of donation, I emphatically, though respectfully, deny the power to do.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan will suspend his remarks. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the bill for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

The pending questions are as follows: Mr. GREEN submitted the following substitute for the original bill, of which the title is, "A bill for the admission of the States of Kansas and Minnesota into the Union:"

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas, by their representatives in convention assembled at Lecompton, in said Territory, on Monday, the 4th day of September, 1857, did form for themselves a constitution and State government; and whereas, the people of the Territory of Minnesota, on the 29th day of August, 1857, by delegates elected for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which was ratified and adopted by the people at an election held on the 13th day of October, A. D. 1857, for that purpose, both of which said constitutions are republican; and said conventions having asked the admission of their respective Territories into the Union as States, on an equal footing with the original States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States of Minnesota and Kansas be, and are hereby, declared to be States of the United States of America, and are hereby admitted into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Minnesota shall have the same boundaries as are prescribed in the act of Congress passed February 26, 1857, entitled, "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States."

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: beginning at a point on the western boundary of the State of Missouri, where the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the eastern boundary of New Mexico; thence north on said boundary to latitude thirty-eight; thence following said boundary westward to the eastern boundary of the Territory of Utah, on the summit of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward on said summit to the fortieth parallel of latitude; thence east on said parallel to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning: Provided, That nothing herein contained respecting the boundary of said State shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said State, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with such tribes, is not, without their consent of said tribes, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the State of Kansas, until such tribes shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within said State, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to make if this act had never passed.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said States of Minnesota and Kansas are admitted into the Union upon the express condition that said States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands in said States, or with any regulations which Congress may find it necessary to make for securing the title to said lands to the bona fide purchasers or grantees thereof, or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition, upon them or other property of the United States within the respective limits of said States; and nothing herein contained shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or any of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance annexed to the constitution of the people of Kansas, nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants which were contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 26, 1857.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken, and an apportionment of Representatives made, the said State of Minnesota shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives in Congress as the population of said State, according to the census authorized by the act approved February 26, 1857, and returned at the time of admission, shall show it to be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation, and no more; and the said State of Kansas shall be entitled, until said apportionment, to one Representative in the Congress of the United States.

This, Mr. PUGH proposes to amend by adding, as an additional section—

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the admission of the States of Minnesota and Kansas into the Union, by this act, shall never be so construed as to deny, limit, or otherwise impair, the right of the people of the said States, with the assent of their Legislatures, severally, at all times, to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper, so that the same be still republican, and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CLARK proposes to offer the following as a substitute for Mr. PUGH's amendment, when he can do so in accordance with the rules. He submitted it, and it was ordered to be printed for the information of Senators:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted into the Union upon the further express condition that nothing contained in the fourteenth section of the schedule of the constitution of said State of Kansas, "done at Lecompton on the 7th day of November, 1857," shall be so construed as to prevent the Legislature of said State, if they shall think necessary to amend, alter, or change said constitution, from recommending, prior to the year 1861, by a majority vote, to the electors of said State to call a convention for that purpose, nor the electors from electing such a convention, nor said convention from making such amendments, changes, or alterations whatever, as they may deem proper. And upon the further express condition that neither the admission of said State with said constitution, nor said constitution itself, shall be construed, or have force to revive, or reenact after said admission, any law or regulation repealed by the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas before the passage of this act, without a reenactment by the Legislature of said State of Kansas after its admission.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. President, in the debate which occurred here in the early part of the last month, I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to say that the question of the reception of the Lecompton constitution was narrowed down to a single point. That point was, whether that constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas. Am I correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct, with this qualification: I could waive the irregularity and agree to the reception of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, provided I was satisfied that it was the act and deed of that people, and embodied their will. There are other objections; but the others I could overcome, if this point were disposed of.

Mr. HAMMOND. I so understood the Senator. I understood that if he could be satisfied that this constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas, all other defects and irregularities would be cured by the act of Congress, and that he himself would be willing to permit such an act to be passed.

Now, sir, the only question with him is, how is that will to be ascertained? and upon that point, and that alone, it is probable we shall differ. I think the Senator fell into a fundamental error in his report dissenting from the report of the majority of the territorial committee, in saying that the convention which framed this constitution was a creature of the Territorial Legislature; and from that error has probably arisen all his subsequent errors on this subject. How can it be possible that the convention should be the creature of a Territorial Legislature? The convention was an assembly of the people in their highest sovereign capacity, about to perform their highest possible act of sovereignty. The Territorial Legislature is a mere provisional government; a petty corporation, appointed and paid by the Congress of the United States, without a particle of sovereign power; and yet, shall that interfere with a sovereignty—inchoate, but still a sovereignty? Why, sir, Congress cannot interfere; Congress cannot confer on the Territorial Legislature the power to interfere. Congress is not sovereign. Congress has sovereign powers, but no sovereignty. Congress has no power to act outside of the limitations of the Constitution; no right to carry into effect the supreme will of any people if it has not been expressed in their constitution; and, therefore, Congress is not sovereign.

Nor does Congress hold the sovereignty of Kansas. The sovereignty of Kansas resides, if it resides anywhere, with the sovereign States of this Union. They have conferred upon Congress, among other powers, the authority of administering their sovereignty to their satisfaction. They have given Congress the power to make needful rules and regulations regarding the Territory; and they have given Congress power to admit a State. Under these two sovereign powers, Congress may first establish a provisional territorial government merely for municipal purposes; and when a State has grown into sovereignty, when that sovereignty which has been kept in abeyance demands recognition, when a community is formed there, a social compact created, a sovereignty born as it were upon the soil, then Congress is gifted with the power to acknowledge that sovereignty; and the Legislature, only by mere usage, oftentimes neglected, assists at the birth of it by passing a precedent resolution assembling a convention.

But, sir, when that convention assembles to form a constitution, it assembles in the highest known capacity of a people, and has no superior in this Government but a State sovereignty; or rather the State sovereignties of all the States alone can do anything with the act of that convention. Then if that convention was lawful, if there is no objection to the convention itself, there can be no objection to the action of the convention; and there is no power on earth that has a right to inquire whether the convention represented the will of the people of Kansas or not. I do not doubt that there might be some cases of such gross and palpable frauds committed in the formation of a convention, as might authorize Congress to investigate them, but I can scarcely conceive of any; and I do not think that Congress has any other power, when a State knocks at the door for admission, but to inquire if her constitution is republican.

If what I have said be correct, then the will of the people of Kansas is to be found in the action of her constitutional convention, and it is not safe to look for it anywhere else. It is immaterial whether it is the will of a majority of the people of Kansas now, or not. The convention was, or ought to have been, elected by a majority of the people of Kansas. A convention, elected in April, may well frame a constitution that would not be agreeable to a majority of the people of a new State, rapidly filling up, in the succeeding January; and if Legislatures are to be allowed to put to a vote the acts of a convention, and have them beaten down by a subsequent influx of emigrants, there is no finality. If you were to send back the Lecompton constitution, and another was to be framed, in the slow way in which we do public business here, before it would reach Congress in another year perhaps the majority would be turned the other way.

Sir, whenever you go outside of the regular forms of law and constitutions to seek for the will of the people you are wandering in a wilderness—a wilderness of thorns. If this was a minority constitution I do not know that that would be an objection to it. Constitutions are made for minorities. Perhaps minorities ought to have the right to make constitutions, for they are administered by majorities. The Constitution of this Union was made by a minority, and as late as 1840 a minority had it in their hands, and could have altered or abolished it; for, in 1840, six out of the twenty-six States of the Union held the numerical majority.

The Senator from Illinois has, upon his view of the Lecompton constitution and the present situation of affairs in Kansas, raised the cry of popular sovereignty. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] yesterday made himself facetious about it, and called it "squatter sovereignty." There is a popular sovereignty which is the basis of our Government, and I am unwilling that the Senator should have the benefit of uniting squatter sovereignty with popular sovereignty. Sir, in all countries and in all time, it is well understood that the numerical majority of the people could, if they chose, exercise the sovereignty of the country; but for want of intelligence, and for want of leaders, they have never yet been able successfully to combine and form a popular government. They have often attempted it, but it has always turned out, instead of a popular sovereignty, a populous sovereignty: and demagogues, placing themselves upon the movement, have invariably led them into military despotism.

I think that the popular sovereignty which the Senator from Illinois would derive from the acts of his Territorial Legislature, and from the information received from partisans and partisan presses, would lead us directly into populous sovereignty, and not popular sovereignty. The first organization of popular sovereignty on a proper basis took place in this country. The first gun of the Revolution was a salute to a new organization of popular sovereignty that was embodied in the Declaration of Independence, developed, elaborated, and inaugurated forever in the Constitution of the United States; and the true pillars of it were representation and the ballot-box, the legal and constitutional ballot-box ordained by the people. In the division of power, in distributing the sovereign powers among the various departments of the Government, the people retained for themselves the single power of the ballot-box; and a great power it was. Through that power they were able to control all the departments of the Government. It was not for the people to be exercising political power in detail; it was not for them to be annoyed with the cares of government; but, from time to time, through the ballot-box, to exert their power to control the whole organization, and sovereignty remained with them. This is popular sovereignty, the popular sovereignty of a legal, constitutional ballot-box; and when spoken through that box, the voice of the people, for all political purposes, is the voice of God; but when it is outside of that, it is the voice of a demon, the doctrine of the reign of terror.

Permit me to say, that in passing I omitted to answer a question that the Senator from Illinois has, I believe, repeatedly asked; and that is, what were the legal powers of the Territorial Legislature after the formation and adoption of the Lecompton constitution? That had nothing to do with the Territorial Legislature. They moved in totally different spheres. The Territorial Legislature was a provisional government almost without power, appointed and paid by this Government. The Lecompton constitution was the act of a people, and the sovereign act of a people. They moved in different spheres and on different planes, and could not come in contact at all without usurpation on the one part or the other. It was not competent for the Lecompton constitution to overturn the territorial government and set up a government in place of it, because that constitution, until acknowledged by Congress, was nothing; it was not in being. It could well order the people of Kansas to pass upon it; it could do whatever was necessary to perfect that constitution, but nothing beyond that, until Congress had agreed to accept it. In the mean time the territorial government, a government ad interim, was entitled to exercise all the sway over the Territory that it ever had been entitled to. The error of assuming, as the Senator did, that the convention was the creature of the territorial government, has led him into the difficulty and confusion of uniting and disuniting these two governments according as it may suit his argument. There is no government in the convention until after the adoption by Congress of its constitution; and there is no interference at any time with the Territorial Legislature, as there is no actual power in the Territorial Legislature even to call a convention, but what is derived from usage and permission, and by an enabling act sometimes from Congress.

If the Senator from Illinois, whom I regard as the Ajax Telemon of this debate, does not press the question of frauds, I shall have little or nothing to say about that. The whole history of Kansas is a disgusting one, from the beginning to the end. I have avoided reading it as much as I could. Had I been a Senator before, I should have felt it my duty, perhaps, to have done so; but not expecting to be one, I am ignorant, fortunately, in a great measure, of detail; and I was glad to hear the acknowledge of the Senator from Illinois, since it excuses me from the duty of examining it.

I hear, on the other side of the Chamber, a great deal said about gigantic and stupendous frauds; and the Senator from New York, yesterday, in portraying the character of his party and the opposite one, laid the whole of those frauds upon the pro-slavery party. To listen to him, you would have supposed that the regiments of emigrants recruited in the purlieus of the great cities of the North, and sent out, armed and equipped with Sharpe's rifles and bowie knives and revolvers, to conquer for freedom in Kansas, stood by, meek saints, innocent as doves, and humble as lambs brought up to the sacrifice. Think of them; General Lane's lambs! They remind one of Colonel Kirk's lambs, to whom they have a family resemblance. I presume that there were frauds; and that if there were frauds, they were equally great on all sides; and that any investigation into them on this floor, or by a commission, would end in nothing but inflicting almost unendurable disgrace on the United States.

But, sir, the true object of the discussion on the other side of the Chamber, is to agitate the question of slavery. I have very great doubts whether the leaders on the other side of the House really wish to defeat this bill. I think they would consider it a vastly greater victory to crush out the Democratic party in the North, and destroy the leaders of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and I am not sure that they have not brought about this imbroglio for the very purpose. How strange is it that they tell us that year after year the majority in Kansas is beaten at the polls? They have always had a majority, but they always get beaten! How could that be? It does seem, from the most reliable sources of information, that they have a majority, and have had a majority for some time. Why has not this majority come forward and taken possession of the government, and made a free-State constitution, and brought it here? We should all have voted for its admission cheerfully. There can be but one reason: if they had brought, as was generally supposed at the time the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed would be the case, a free-State constitution here, there would have been no difficulty among the northern Democrats; they would have been sustained by their people. The statement made by some of them, as I understood, that that act was a good free-State act, would have been verified, and the northern Democratic party would have been sustained; but its coming here a slave State, it is said, will kill that party, and that is the reason they have refrained from going to the polls; that is the reason they have refrained from making it a free State when they had the power. They intend to make it a free State as soon as they have effected that purpose of destroying the Democratic party at the North, and their true reason here is to agitate slavery. For one, I am not disposed to discuss that question here in any abstract form. I think the time has gone by for that. Our minds are all made up. I am willing to discuss it—and that is the way it should be and must be discussed—as a practical thing, as a thing that is, and is to be; and to discuss its effect upon our political institutions, and to ascertain how long those political institutions will hold together under its effects.

The Senator from New York entered very fairly into this field yesterday. I was surprised, the other day, when he so openly said the battle had been fought and won. Although I knew, and had long known it to be true, I was surprised to hear him say so. I thought that he had been entrapped into a hasty expression by the sharp rebukes of the Senator from New Hampshire; and I am glad to see that yesterday he has come out and shown that it is a matured project of his, that these words mean all that I thought they meant; that they mean that the South is a conquered province, and that the North intends to rule it. He said that it was their intention to take this Government from unjust and unfaithful hands, and place it in just and faithful hands; that it was their intention to consecrate all the Territories of the Union to free labor; and that, to effect their purposes, they intended to reconstruct the Supreme Court.

Yesterday, the Senator said, "suppose we admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution; what guarantees are there that Congress will not again interfere with the affairs of Kansas?" meaning, I suppose, that if she abolished slavery, what guarantee there was that Congress would not force it upon her again. Sir, so far as we of the South are concerned, you have, at least, the guarantee of good faith that never has been violated. But what guarantee have we, when you have this Government in your possession, in all its departments, even if we submit quietly to what the Senator exhorts us to submit to—the concentration of slavery in its present territory, and even to the reconstruction of the Supreme Court—that you will not plunder us with tariffs; that you will not bankrupt us with internal improvements and bounties on fish; that you will not restrain us with navigation laws, and other laws impeding the facilities of transportation to southern produce? What guarantee have we that you will not create a new bank, and concentrate all the finances of this country at the North, where already, for the want of direct trade and a proper system of banking in the South, they are ruinously concentrated? Nay, sir, what guarantee have we that you will not emancipate our slaves, or, at least, make the attempt? We cannot rely on your faith when you have the power. It has been always broken whenever pledged.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1858.

Now, sir, as I am disposed to see this question settled as soon as possible, and am perfectly willing to have a final and conclusive settlement now, instantly, and after what the Senator from New York has said, I think it not unimportant that I should attempt to bring the North and South face to face, and see what resources each of us might have in the contingency of separate organizations. If we never acquire another foot of territory for the South, look at her. Eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles; as large as Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, and Spain. Is not that territory enough to make an empire that shall rule the world? With the finest soil, the most delightful climate, whose productions none of those great countries can produce, we have three thousand miles of continental shore line, and so indented with bays and crowded with islands, that, when their shore lines are added, we have twelve thousand miles of shore line. Through the heart of our country runs the great Mississippi, the father of waters, into whose bosom are poured thirty-six thousand miles of tributary streams; and beyond we have the desert prairie wastes, to protect us in our rear. Can you hem in such a territory as that? You talk of putting up a wall of fire around eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles so situated! How absurd.

But, sir, in this territory lies the great valley of the Mississippi, now the real, and soon to be the acknowledged seat of the empire of the world. The sway of that valley will be as great as ever the Nile knew in the earlier ages of mankind. We own the most of that valley. The most valuable part of it belongs to us; and although those who have settled above us are now opposed to us, another generation will tell a different tale. They are ours by all the laws of nature; slave-labor will go over every foot of this great valley where it will be found profitable to use it, and those who do not use it are soon to be united with us by such ties as will make us one and inseparable. The iron horse will soon be clattering over the sunny plains of the South to bear the products of its upper tributaries to our Atlantic ports, as it now clatters over the ice-bound North. There is the great Mississippi, a bond of union made by nature's law. She will forever vindicate her right to the Union. On this fine territory we have a population four times as large as that with which these colonies separated from the mother country, and a hundred, I might say a thousand fold as strong. Our population is now sixty per cent. greater than that of the whole United States when we entered into the second war of independence. It is twice as large as the whole population of the United States was ten years after the conclusion of that war, and our exports are three times as great as those of the whole United States then. Upon our muster-rolls we have a million of men. In a defensive war, upon an emergency, every one of them would be available. At any time, the

the South can raise, equip, and maintain in the field, a larger army than any Power of the earth can send against her, and an army of soldiers—men brought up on horseback, with guns in their hands.

If we take the North, even when the two large States of Kansas and Minnesota shall be admitted, her territory will be one hundred thousand square miles short of ours. I do not speak of California and Oregon; there is no antagonism between the South and those countries, and never will be. The population of the North is fifty per cent. greater than ours. I have nothing to say in disparagement either of the soil of the North, or the people of the North, who are a brave, intelligent, energetic race, full of intellect, but they produce no great staple that the South does not produce; but we produce two or three, and those are the very greatest, that she can never produce. As to her men, however high they may be, they have never proved themselves to be superior to those of the South, either in the field or in the Senate.

But, sir, the strength of a nation depends in a great measure upon its wealth, and the wealth of a nation, like that of a man, is to be estimated by its surplus production. You may go to your trashy census books, all of which is perfect nonsense, and they will tell you that in the State of Tennessee, the whole number of house-servants is not equal to one half those in my own house, and such things as that. You may ascertain what is made throughout the country from these census books, but it is no matter how much is made if it is all consumed. If a man is worth millions of dollars and consumes his income, is he rich? Is he competent to embark in any new enterprise? Can he build ships or railroads? And could a people in that condition build ships and roads and go to war? All the enterprises of peace and war depend upon the surplus productions of a people. They may be happy, they may be comfortable, they may enjoy themselves in eating what they make; but they are not rich, they are not strong. It seems, by going to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, which are authentic, that last year the United States exported in round numbers $279,000,000 worth of domestic produce, excluding gold and foreign merchandise reexported. Of this amount $155,000,000 worth is the clear produce of the South; articles that are not and cannot be made at the North. Here are then $80,000,000 worth of exports of products of the forest, animal provisions, and breadstuffs. If we assume that the South made but one third of these, and I think that is a low calculation, our exports are $185,000,000, leaving to the North less than $95,000,000.

In addition to this, we send to the North $30,000,000 worth of cotton, which is not counted in the exports. We send to her $8,000,000 worth of tobacco, which is not counted in the exports. We send naval stores, lumber, rice, and many other minor articles. There is no doubt that we send to the North $40,000,000 in addition; but suppose the amount to be $35,000,000, and it will give us a surplus production of $220,000,000. The recorded exports of the South now are greater than the whole exports of the United States in any year before 1856. They are greater than the whole average exports of the United States for the last twelve years, including the two extraordinary years of 1856 and 1857. They are nearly double the amount of the average exports of the twelve preceding years. If I am right in my calculations as to $220,000,000 of surplus produce, there is not a nation on the face of the earth, with any numerous population, that can compete with us in produce per capita. It amounts to $16 66 per head, supposing that we have twelve million people. England, with all her accumulated wealth, with her concentrated and intellectualized energy, makes under sixteen dollars of surplus production per head.

I have not made a calculation as to the North, with her $95,000,000 surplus; but, admitting that she exports as much as we do, with her eighteen millions of population it would be but little over twelve dollars a head at the outside. She cannot export to us and abroad exceeding ten dollars a head against our sixteen dollars. I know well enough that the North sends to the South a vast amount of the productions of her industry. I take it for granted that she, at least, pays us in that way for the thirty or forty million dollars worth of cotton and other articles we send her. I am willing to admit that she pays us considerably more; but to bring her up to our amount of surplus production, to bring her up to $220,000,000 of surplus production, the South must take from her $125,000,000; and this, in addition to our share of the consumption of the $333,000,000 worth introduced into the country from abroad, and paid for in part by our own exports. The thing is absurd; it is impossible; it can never appear anywhere but on a census statistic book.

With an export of $220,000,000 under the present tariff, the South organized separately would have about $40,000,000 of revenue. With one fourth the present tariff she would have a revenue adequate to all her wants, for the South would never go to war; she would never need an army or a navy, beyond a few garrisons on the frontiers and a few revenue cutters. It is commerce that breeds war. It is manufactures that require to be hawked about over the world, and give rise to navies and commerce. But we have nothing to do but to take off restrictions on foreign merchandise and open our ports, and the whole world will come to us to trade. They will be too glad to bring and carry for us, and we never shall dream of a war. Why, sir, the South has never yet had a just cause of war. Every time she has seized her sword it has been on the point of honor, and that point of honor has been mainly loyalty to her sister colonies and sister States, who have ever since plundered and calumniated her.

But if there were no other reason why we should never have a war, would any sane nation make war on cotton? Without firing a gun, without drawing a sword, when they make war on us we can bring the whole world to our feet. The South is perfectly competent to go on, one, two, or three years without planting a seed of cotton. I believe that if she was to plant but half her cotton, it would be an immense advantage to her. I am not so sure but that after three years' cessation she would come out stronger than ever she was before and better prepared to enter afresh upon her great career of enterprise. What would happen if no cotton was furnished for three years? I will not stop to depict what every one can imagine, but this is certain: old England would topple headlong and carry the whole civilized world with her. No, sir, you dare not make war on cotton. No power on earth dares make war upon it. Cotton is king. Until lately the Bank of England was king, but she tried to put her screws as usual, the fall before last, upon the cotton crop, and was utterly vanquished. The last power has been conquered. Who can doubt it that has looked at recent events? When the abuse of credit had destroyed credit and annihilated confidence, when thousands of the strongest commercial houses in the world were coming down, and hundreds of millions of dollars of supposed property evaporating in thin air, when you came to a dead lock, and revolutions were threatened, what brought you up? Fortunately for you it was the commencement of the cotton season, and we have poured in upon you one million six hundred thousand bales of cotton just at the crisis to save you from sinking. That cotton, but for the bursting of your speculative bubbles in the North, which produced the whole of this convulsion, would have brought us $100,000,000. We have sold it for $65,000,000, and saved you. Thirty-five million dollars we, the slaveholders of the South, have put into the charity box of your magnificent financiers, your cotton lords, your merchant princes.

But, sir, the greatest strength of the South arises from the harmony of her political and social institutions. This harmony gives her a frame of society, the best in the world, and an extent of political freedom, combined with entire security, such as no other people ever enjoyed upon the face of the earth. Society precedes government; creates it, and ought to control it; but as far as we can look back in historic times we find the case different; for government is no sooner created than it becomes too strong for society, and shapes and molds, as well as controls it. In later centuries the progress of civilization and of intelligence has made the divergence so great as to produce civil wars and revolutions; and it is nothing now but the want of harmony between governments and societies which occasions all the uneasiness and trouble and terror that we see abroad. It was this that brought on the American Revolution. We threw off a Government not adapted to our social system, and made one for ourselves. The question is, how far have we succeeded? The South, so far as that is concerned, is satisfied, content, happy, harmonious, and prosperous.

In all social systems there must be a class to do the mean duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, refinement, and civilization. It constitutes the very mud-sills of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on the mud-sills. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand. A race inferior to herself, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for the purpose, and call them slaves. We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by ears polite; but I will not characterize that class at the North with that term; but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal.

The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; and all the powers of the earth cannot abolish it. God only can do it when he repeals the fiat, "the poor ye always have with you;" for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole class of manual laborers and operatives, as you call them, are slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most deplorable manner, at any hour, in any street in any of your large towns. Why, sir, you meet more beggars in one day, in any single street of the city of New York, than you would meet in a lifetime in the whole South. Our slaves are black, of another, inferior race. The status in which we have placed them is an elevation. They are elevated from the condition in which God first created them, by being made our slaves. None of that race on the whole face of the globe can be compared with the slaves of the South, and they know it. They are happy, content, unaspiring, and utterly incapable, from intellectual degradation, ever to give us any trouble by their aspirations.

Your slaves are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than an army with bayonets, and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your government reconstructed, your property divided, not as they have mistakenly attempted to initiate such proceedings by meeting in parks, with arms in their hands, but by the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very hearthstones. How would you like for us to send lecturers or agitators North, to teach these people this, to aid and assist in combining, and to lead them?

Mr. WILSON and others. Send them along.

Mr. HAMMOND. You say, send them North.

There is no need of that. They are coming here. They are thundering at our doors for homesteads of one hundred and sixty acres of land for nothing, and southern Senators are supporting it. Nay, they are assembling, as I have said, with arms in their hands, and demanding work at $1,000 a year and six hours a day. Have you heard that the ghost of Mendoza is stalking in the streets of your big cities; that the inquisition is at hand? There is aloft a fearful rumor that there have been consultations for vigilance committees. You know what that means already. Transient and temporary causes have thus far been your preservation. The great West has been open to your surplus population, and your hordes of semi-barbarian emigrants, who are crowding in year by year. They make a great movement, and you call it progress. Whither? It is progress; but it is progress towards vigilance committees. The South have sustained you in a great measure. You are our factors. You bring and carry for us. One hundred and fifty million dollars of our money passes annually through your hands. Much of it sticks; all of it assists to keep your machinery together and in motion. Suppose we were to discharge you; suppose we were to take our business out of your hands; we should consign you to anarchy and poverty.

You complain of the rule of the South: that has been another cause that has preserved you. We have kept the Government conservative to the great purposes of the Government. We have placed her, and kept her, upon the Constitution; and that has been the cause of your peace and prosperity. The Senator from New York says that that is about to be at an end; that you intend to take the Government from us; that it will pass from our hands. Perhaps what he says is true; it may be; but do not forget—it can never be forgotten; it is written on the brightest page of human history—that we, the slaveholders of the South, took our country in her infancy; and, after ruling her for sixty out of the seventy years of her existence, we shall surrender her to you without a stain upon her honor, boundless in prosperity, incalculable in her strength, the wonder and the admiration of the world. Time will show what you will make of her; but no time can ever diminish our glory or your responsibility.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before entering, Mr. President, upon the discussion of the merits of this important controversy, I feel called upon to notice, in brief terms, some considerations thrown into this debate which partake less of argument addressed to our judgments and consciences than of appeals calculated to alarm the apprehensions of patriots devoted to the Constitution and the Union.

It has been more than intimidated by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and again by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] that unless Kansas be admitted at once into the Union as a slave State under the Lecompton constitution, the Union of these States is to be broken up, and the Constitution overthrown; and the whole speech of the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] seemed to be based on the same idea. Sir, if I could be brought to believe that any such national calamity would follow, or that there were any well-grounded apprehensions that it might follow, I am free to confess these appeals would be entitled to great consideration. I cannot, like the honorable Senator who has preceded me, coldly calculate the value of this Union, and compare the strength, power, and resources of the southern and northern confederacies into which he is prepared to divide it, and determine which shall hold the mastery. That is not the school in which I have been reared. Love for the Union, earnest, intense, undying love for the Union of these States, was instilled into my bosom in my earliest childhood. Next to the God of heaven, I was taught to love, honor, and defend it under all circumstances and against all enemies, from without and from within. That sentiment has grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength; and now, in the full vigor of manhood, it is my deep and sacred conviction to-day, that, as a nation, we are indebted to that Union for all we have been, for all we are, and for all we may hope to be. By that Union this nation, in its past history and its present position, and, if true to itself, in its future destiny, is to be the highest, the greatest, and most divinely favored the sun ever shone upon. In that Union, under God, as a nation in all that constitutes national greatness and makes us a Power among the nations upon the earth, we live and move and have our being. The great orator of New England, on this floor, more than a quarter of a century ago, gave utterance to this sentiment, so dear and so sacred to every American heart, in words too striking and too forcible ever to be forgotten: "Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable." Cherishing as I do this sentiment, in common, as I believe, with the great mass of the American people, I am free to confess, sir, that I can never hear the dissolution of that Union suggested from any respectable quarter as an event that may happen, without profound emotion; and I have deemed it my first duty to consider well whether there are any reasonable grounds to apprehend such a result before I enter upon a discussion of the merits of the controversy now going on. I have duly considered that question, as I believe, in all its bearings, and have arrived at the conclusion that there is no just foundation for any such apprehensions; and I will briefly state my reasons.

First of all, Mr. President, the union of these States is the most sacredly cherished object of the patriotic devotion of all the people of the several States, with very few exceptions, North, South, East, and West. There are a few individuals, both North and South, to be found, who would, if they could, break it up; but, I doubt not, that arises from some peculiar constitution of their minds; while, with the great mass of the people of the United States, the men of sober judgment and good common sense, they are regarded as impracticable men, with morbid or diseased imaginations, who are entitled to very little weight. There have been times when, from newspaper reports thrown out in the heat of political excitement, some of the prominent men of Mississippi and South Carolina have been said to favor a dissolution of the Union; but the warm and devoted attachment declared by both the Senators from Mississippi—the one, [Mr. BROWN,] in his recent speech on Kansas affairs; the other, [Mr. DAVIS,] in his reply to the question of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,]—satisfies me that loyalty to the Union is still the sentiment of the people of that State. From the same source, (newspaper reports,) the position of the members of Congress from South Carolina upon this subject has been questioned. I am informed that a certain newspaper published in South Carolina, called the Charleston Mercury, in 1856, in reply to an article in the New York Herald, declared that—

"Upon the policy of dissolving the Union, of separating the South from her northern enemies, and establishing a southern confederacy, parties, presses, politicians, and people, are a unit. There is not a single public man in her limits, not one of her present Representatives or Senators in Congress, who is not pledged to the lips in favor of disunion."

Notwithstanding this statement of a paper published in Charleston, South Carolina, I have been led to believe, and I do believe, that it is but the heated declaration of a newspaper editor, thrown out in the midst of a political canvass, and similar to some threats against the Union we saw in the Richmond Enquirer during the presidential canvass; which, we were afterwards informed, were made as the only means of saving the Union! Notwithstanding what has just fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, with all due respect I must still be permitted to say, that, in my opinion, ninety-nine in a hundred of all the people of the United States are, in their very heart of hearts, loyal to the Union; and that it is not in the power of Congress, in this or the other branch, or both together, to dissolve this Union, if they were to undertake it. Members of Congress are sent here to support the Constitution and the Union. They are sworn to support them; and any attempt to overturn either would not only bring the crime of treason and perjury upon themselves, but it would prove wholly futile.

The resolutions of State Legislatures, passed under the political excitement of the hour, we have all seen before. Vermont it was whose Legislature resolved that, in case Texas was annexed, the Union was dissolved ipso facto. I believe some one or more of the extreme southern States passed similar resolutions in case California was admitted as a free State. But the Union still stands; and, in my humble opinion, with all due deference and respect to the resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, it will still stand, though Kansas should be admitted under the Topeka or Lecompton constitution, or admitted under neither; and it will stand forever. Sir, the people of these United States, upon their sober second thought, will not only not dissolve this Union themselves, but they will not suffer it to be dissolved. Any man, or set of men, or any party, who may undertake it, will, in my opinion, in the end be utterly overwhelmed and buried beyond the hope of political resurrection.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at this point? The remark which he has just made has frequently fallen from the other side of the Chamber; and as it is somewhat ambiguous and oracular, I should like to have a clear explanation of it. I wish to know whether the Senator means that the power of this Government would be exerted to coerce a State into the Union?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The ground which I take is, that the great mass of the people in all the States are pledged to maintain the Union, and they will maintain it; and it is not in the power of any politicians or any set of politicians in the States to dissolve the Union, if they were to undertake to do so. The people will not only not dissolve it, but they will not suffer it to be dissolved. When the question comes to be discussed and understood and brought home to the hearts and the hearthstones of the people, there is, in my opinion, no State where the party that shall undertake to accomplish disunion will not be utterly annihilated and overwhelmed beyond the hope of political resurrection.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator does not seem to comprehend my question. I have heard it said on this floor—I need not allude to what has been said in the papers—that the North would not permit any State to secede from the Union. What I wished to understand from the Senator was, whether he meant to say that the physical power, the military and naval force of the Government, should be exerted to coerce any State back into the Union after she had chosen to separate herself?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When cases arise, it will be time enough to meet them. I do not say what possibly might arise. I am only speaking of what I believe cannot arise. I say that, in my opinion, no State in this Union will secede, or attempt to secede, and no set of men in any State can persuade the people to undertake to secede—not even in South Carolina—whether Kansas be admitted as a State under the Lecompton or the Topeka constitution, or not admitted under any constitution at all, for five years to come. I do not believe that I underestimate the power of politicians, or overestimate the good sense and intelligence of the American people, when I say that I do not believe it to be in the power of all the politicians in Washington to break up the union of these States, if they were to undertake it. Whenever the hour of trial shall come, the deep, the devoted, the intense, the undying love of the great mass of the American people for the union of these States will prove itself to be stronger and more abiding than the power of any political organization. I know that in ordinary times, and upon questions of ordinary interest, public opinion may be swayed, molded, and, to a certain extent, controlled, by men in office, by party machinery, and political organizations; and then public opinion would seem to be the mere voice of the politicians; but there are other times and other questions—great emergencies—times that try the souls of men, when the deep fountains of the human heart are broken up; and then it is as true to-day as it was in the days of the Revolution, the voice of the people is the voice of God. At times, it is true public opinion is a gently flowing stream, to some extent easily diverted in its course, upon whose smooth, tranquil surface, politicians and office-seekers may float upon their platforms into place and power; but there are other times when the heavens are darkened and the storm is gathered, when the rains have descended and the floods have come, that it rolls along, fit emblem of Almighty wrath and power; resistance but maddens its fury and increases its strength; when mere politicians and platforms and party organizations are all swept away, to become mere floodwood upon the surface of the rushing current. Sir, there can be no mistaking the fact that a great emergency is now upon us. We are in the midst of a revolution not altogether bloodless, in which, for the first time in the history of the American Government, the Administration at Washington, by an armed intervention, is endeavoring to force a State into the Union against the will of its people. The President may ignore the true condition of affairs; he may honestly suppose that there is a great delusion in the public mind, instead of his own; but he will learn, and the politicians will learn, that the people of these United States are about to take this matter into their own hands. From Maine to Kansas, we hear their voice demanding in thunder tones that this Lecompton constitution shall not be forced upon that people against their will. And, sir, if you will listen to the voice of the great majority of the people, even from the southern States, you will soon hear coming up, from their very heart of hearts, now in whispers, now in plain, out-spoken words, curses, not loud, but deep, and none the less bitter, against this whole Kansas policy, from the beginning to the end.

But, sir, to return to the point from which I have digressed. Pray, sir, what political party desires the dissolution of this Union? Is it the American party? Its whole existence is staked upon its Americanism and its nationality. Is it the party which claims, par excellence, to be the National Democratic party?—strange as the misnomer may seem to me, applied to a party to which, at this day, neither Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, nor Jackson, could consistently belong. But, however it may have lost sight of the principles of that party in its earlier days, it still claims to be national in its character, the champion of the Union, of law and order. All its professions—and I am bound to believe, for I yield to others the same patriotism and sincerity of purpose which I claim for myself—all its convictions and aspirations are to sustain law and order, and to maintain the perpetuity of the Constitution and the Union. Is it, then, the Republican party which is in favor of a dissolution of the Union? Sir, I know it has been sometimes charged that the Republican party is sectional in its purposes and disloyal to the Union; that it aims to trample down the constitutional rights of the States, and thus, indirectly, undermine the foundations of the Union. This charge is utterly groundless. That party commenced its organization at Pittsburg on the 22d of February, 1856; and in its address and resolutions there was not a doctrine, not a syllable, which conflicts in any degree with the doctrines of the old Republican party of 1798; and in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, in the resolutions passed almost unanimously by the Republican members of the Legislature of Wisconsin upon my nomination to a place in this body, they expressly adopted and incorporated, as a part of their very platform, the resolutions passed by the Kentucky and Virginia Legislatures in 1798-99 in relation to the reserved rights, sovereignty, and independence of the several States. While, upon the one hand, there will be found no State more loyal to the Union and the Constitution than Wisconsin, upon the other hand there will be found no State ready to maintain in full vigor, with greater energy or more devotion, the reserved rights, sovereignty, and independence, of each and every member of the Confederacy. In answer to this oft-repeated charge as to the disloyalty of the Republican party to the Constitution and the Union, I beg leave to read a brief extract from the address which was put forth at its organization in Pittsburg in February, 1856:

“We declare, in the first place, our fixed and unaltered devotion to the Constitution of the United States—to the ends for which it was established, and to the means which it provided for their attainment.

“We declare our purpose to obey, in all things, the requirements of the Constitution, and of all laws enacted in pursuance thereof. We cherish a profound reverence for the wise and patriotic men by whom it was framed, and a lively sense of the blessings it has conferred upon our country and upon mankind throughout the world. In every crisis of difficulty and of danger we shall invoke its spirit, and proclaim the supremacy of its authority.

“In the next place, we declare our ardent and unshaken attachment to this Union of American States which the Constitution created and has thus far preserved. We revere it as the purchase of the blood of our forefathers, as the condition of our national renown, and as the guardian and guarantee of that liberty which the Constitution was designed to secure. We will defend and protect it against all its enemies. We will recognize no geographical divisions, no local interests, no narrow or sectional prejudices, in our endeavors to preserve the union of these States against foreign aggression and domestic strife. What we claim for ourselves, we claim for all. The rights, privileges, and liberties, which we demand as our inheritance, we concede as their inheritance to all the citizens of this Republic.”

The Republican party was hardly organized when the campaign of 1856 came on. Its organization is still going on, preparatory to taking possession of this Government in 1860. Its purposes are not to trample upon the rights of the South; not to strike down any of the institutions of the South; but simply to restore the administration of the Federal Government to the policy of the early republican fathers. It asks for nothing more; it will be satisfied with nothing less. The cardinal point upon which this party is gathered, the flag which it bears at the head of its column, is the Constitution, the Union, the rights of the States, and the rights of the Federal Government. With very few exceptions, every resolution, every well-considered speech of every prominent member of the party, from its organization at Pittsburg on the 22d of February, 1856, to this hour, breathes the spirit of ardent loyalty to the Union; and if ever a political party can be “pledged to the lips” in favor of maintaining the Constitution and the Union at all hazards, against all enemies from abroad, and against all traitors at home, it is the Republican party. I know that in the campaign of 1856 this charge was made against the Republican party, with tremendous effect, in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, and also throughout all the southern States, where scarcely any newspaper could be found to give utterance to its doctrines, where its speeches and addresses were prevented from circulation, and where the great mass of the people could neither understand nor appreciate its purposes and motives. I know that during that canvass it was sometimes threatened, even in the northern States, that in case Colonel Fremont should be elected President of the United States by the legal votes and suffrages of the American people, he should never be inaugurated; that Colonel Fremont, though legally elected, though he stood pledged before the American people to maintain the Constitution, the Union, and the rights of the several States, should never be permitted to take the oath of office in Washington city, but that the Union would be dissolved. I never heard but one reply from the Republicans: “If Mr. Buchanan is elected, we will stand by the Union; if Mr. Fillmore is elected, we will stand by the Union; and if Colonel Fremont is elected, we will stand by the Union; ay, we will fight for the Union to the very death; and if any man, high or low, attempts to overthrow it, we will indict him for treason, try him for treason, and, if the jury do not acquit him upon the ground of insanity, and if the President do not interfere to pardon him, we will hang him as sure as there is a God in heaven.”

If that be disloyalty to the Union, then, sir, the Republican party plead guilty to the charge, but not otherwise. This oft-repeated charge against the Republican party is utterly groundless. They are pledged, not only not to dissolve the Union themselves, but not to suffer it to be dissolved; to use every power which God has given them to prevent its dissolution! The Union of these States was formed in that struggle which gave American liberty its birth; the same struggle which brought to man upon earth the glad tidings of political redemption. Although it cost the treasure, the agony, and the blood of our ancestors to achieve it, I trust the time will never come, which seems to be anticipated by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] when it will cost the blood, the agony, and the treasure, of their sons to maintain it. But, sir, let me tell that honorable Senator, that the same spirit which shaped the destiny and guided the deliberations of our forefathers in the formation of the Union, still lives—not in one section alone, but in every section and in every State; and that same spirit will be ever ready to cement again, if it be necessary, in the blood of the sons, the eternal Union made by the fathers. There is a spirit in the American people which, on board the ship of State, as it may occasionally seem to ride over the breakers, needs but to be awakened from apparent slumber to arise, and say with a Savior's voice to the storm and the raging sea, “Peace, be still!” and that voice will be obeyed.

It will never be forgotten by the American people, that the bonds of the Union were sealed with the blood of a common ancestry, with common sacrifices, heroism, and suffering. Whatever politicians may say in hours of excitement, when the day of trial comes the American people will be ready to imitate and to emulate the example of their forefathers. They gathered around Washington from the North and from the South. Like a band of brothers, ready to endure every sacrifice and every hardship, together often they shared their scanty meal, and on the cold winter night together shared their thin and tattered covering; shoulder to shoulder, indeed, they stood in the day of conflict, freely baring their bosoms in each other's defense; together, often their very life-blood gushed and mingled; and side by side their ashes still rest upon that soil which their united valor defended. The Union is still consecrated by holding those ashes—those sacred ashes. To any man who proposes to dissolve the Union, I desire to put this question: where will you draw the line of separation—upon which side of Mount Vernon shall it fall?

Sir, I know not how others may feel; I know not how our brethren of the southern States may feel; but this one thing I know: there is no power on earth can hold the tomb of Washington upon a soil and within a jurisdiction foreign to the twenty millions of people who inhabit the northern and western States of this Confederacy; and I believe the same may be said of the great mass of the people of the middle States, if it be not true to the same extent of the extreme southern States. And as for Wisconsin she was born of Virginia—born in the days of her revolutionary heroes and statesmen; in the days of her youthful vigor; in the days, too, of her true republican principles. Like Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, Wisconsin, though the youngest of the sisters, takes equal pride in tracing her parentage to the Old Dominion, the mother of States and of statesmen. She takes pride in the great names of the statesmen of Virginia; she claims them as part of her inheritance. If the day shall ever come—which may God in his mercy avert!—when treason shall raise its head against the Constitution and the Union, and undertake to sever Virginia from her offspring, be assured, sir, that the teeming millions who inhabit those northwestern States, as well as all the northern and eastern States, and the untold millions of their descendants, will continue to bear the same flag which Washington bore, and they will belong to the land that holds his ashes, though the peaceful Potomac, which flows by his tomb, shall run red with the blood of traitors. They will never surrender their birthright, and it shall never be taken from them. This Constitution is their Constitution; this country is their country; the flag of the Union is their flag; and they will never desert it, never surrender it. "What we claim for ourselves, we claim for all. The rights, privileges, and liberties, which we demand as our inheritance, we concede as their inheritance, to all the citizens of this Republic."

The union of these States is cemented by another bond no less strong—the bond of a common interest in the great valley of the Mississippi. I agree with the honorable Senator who preceded me, that the valley of the Mississippi will bind the Union together in bonds which can never be broken. Situated as Wisconsin is, with her whole eastern boundary upon the great lakes, whose waters flow into the Atlantic, she has a common interest and sympathy with all the northern and eastern and Atlantic States. Bounded upon the west by the Mississippi, with her navigable waters flowing into it, by nature and geographical position she has a common interest with all those States whose waters flow into the Gulf of Mexico from the great valley of the Mississippi, to maintain forever the free and uninterrupted commerce of the Mississippi and the Gulf, which the Constitution of the United States secures.

The proposition by Spain to cede to England or France the Island of Cuba would arouse the opposition of the whole American people almost as one man; and why, sir? Simply because, in the hands of a strong naval power, from its geographical position and harbors it would command the commerce of the valley of the Mississippi; in short, because Havana is the Sebastopol of the Gulf. Do you suppose, sir, that the people of the Mississippi valley, to say nothing of the great commercial States, who furnished the money to purchase Louisiana, will ever consent that the mouths of the Mississippi shall be held in a foreign jurisdiction? No man doubts the chivalry or bravery of Louisiana, or of any portion of the people of the southern States; but there is an irresistible logic in overwhelming numbers, and numbers, too, constantly augmenting in almost geometrical progression under the operation of the laws of emigration and population with an unerring certainty as the revolutions of the earth. To suppose that even now, and more especially when, within the next thirty years, there shall be a free white population of more than fifty millions with an identity of interest in the commerce of the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico, they will suffer the outlet of that commerce to be held by a foreign State, on account of negroes held in slavery by a few hundred thousand citizens of some of the States of this Union, would be as idle as to undertake to dam the waters of the Mississippi, to chain the lightning, or, like Xerxes, the Hellespont itself. It is one of those things which cannot be done, sir; no line of separation can be made to divide the valley of the Mississippi. You cannot cut that river in two. As all that vast, and as yet but comparatively undeveloped region, drained by that river, embracing all your territories between the Alleghenies and the Rocky Mountains, shall become filled up with untold millions of the most hardy, brave, intelligent, and enterprising people, they will bind this Union together in bonds of common interest, language, and sympathy, which no power on earth can sever. Like its eternal, ever-flowing waters, the commerce of the Mississippi shall flow ever and onward uninterrupted to the Gulf. Divide the valley of the Mississippi? No, sir; never, till those waters cease to flow, and those fertile valleys cease to yield the necessities for human life. This Union rests upon a foundation more enduring than any mere human enactments. It rests upon the laws and the necessities of our population and geographical position; upon the laws which govern the growth of ages in the history of mankind. The same Almighty Being who watched over its infant colonization, its revolutionary struggle for the independence of the soil and its second struggle for the freedom of the seas, its struggle for the independence of its Treasury from the domination and control of associated wealth, still watches over every step of its growth and progress; and, in spite of parties and platforms, presses and politicians, is carrying it onward, and right onward to the high destiny to which He has called it.

Another set of stockholders, in another kind of institution than a national bank, but compared with which all the power of a national bank was a mere pigmy, undertake to seize hold of this Government, and commence offensive, aggressive operations against the people of the North and their free institutions; but the same Providence will watch over us in our struggles with this power.

Statesmen may see and appreciate the causes that are in operation around us. They may see and feel the mighty current of emigration, the power of population which is bringing upon this continent the bravest, the best, and the most enterprising of the whole human family, by millions upon millions. It would be wise for statesmen to see and appreciate these causes, which they can no more control than they can control the currents of air or of ocean. This vast continent was reserved in the providence of God for the very purpose of giving full scope for the development of man under the influence of modern and Christian civilization. Our system of government is but the outgrowth of that civilization. It is adapted to it and based upon it. It has no precedent; it has no compeer. All that has preceded it has but prepared the way for its coming; and its whole grand object, end, and aim, is to work out for man upon earth a better, higher, and more divine life. The prophets foresaw it; the good men of all ages have longed and prayed for its approach; and, in my opinion, Heaven, with all its omnipotence, stands pledged for its success. This Union, this Constitution, this form of government, this wonderful development, this position among the Powers of the earth, is not a thing of accident or of chance. No, sir, "there's a divinity that shapes our ends."

My confidence in the perpetuity of the Union rises in its character to be a strong and abiding faith—a faith based upon the devoted patriotism of the great mass of the American people; upon identity of language, sympathy, and interest; upon a common history, common recollections, common hopes, and a common destiny. It rests, moreover, in a great measure, upon the promises revealed in that volume which all Christians accept as Divine. It is a faith with me which never wavers; which no idle threats can disturb for a moment; which every reason addressed to the understanding confirms, and which every sentiment of patriotism approves; and which, under the sanction of a deep religious conviction, leans upon the Almighty for its strength.

Mr. KING. As my friend from Wisconsin will not be able to conclude to-day, I ask him to give way to a motion to adjourn, or for an executive session, if that be the disposition of the other side.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I yield the floor.

Mr. KING. Unless there is a disposition on the other side to have an executive session, I shall move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FITCH. I should like to have an executive session.

Mr. KING. I make that motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

Mr. BIGGS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Clark, Clay, Fitch, Green, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Stuart, Toombs, and Wright—19.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MASON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Fitch, Green, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Toombs, and Wright—19.

And thereupon the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. C. GRANBERRY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPROPER EXECUTIVE INFLUENCE.

The SPEAKER stated the first question in order to be a resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOARD,] in reference to alleged attempts of the Executive to improperly influence the action of members of the House. The pending question is, shall the resolution be received and entertained, on the ground that the privileges of the House are involved?

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill to extend the provisions of certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers in the military service of the United States, for reference only.

Mr. HARLAN. I object, unless there shall be an understanding that we all shall have equal opportunity to introduce bills.

Mr. HOARD took the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has not the gentleman from New York addressed the House once already? Immediately after the Chair submitted the question the other day, the gentleman made his speech, and then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] replied to him. If the Chair decides in favor of my point, I claim the floor.

Mr. HOARD. What I said was in response to a letter which had been introduced. I send a modification of my resolution to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the modification, as follows:

Insert the words in the preamble: "And further, to show the propriety of adopting the following resolution, I, CHARLES B. HOARD, a member of the House of Representatives, state that common fame charges the President of the United States with endeavors to control the action of members of this House on the question of admitting Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, by offers of executive appointments, to be subject to their control."

Mr. LETCHER. Let the resolution be read as it now stands.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, a statement has been made by a member of this House, importing that the Hon. Mr. BURNS, of Ohio, had stated to him, in a conversation on the subject of his vote on the resolutions of Hon. Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, to commit to a select committee the President's message on the Kansas question, that he was to have certain official patronage or appointments to office at his disposal; and whereas, the Hon. Mr. BURNS had previously been free in his avowal of sentiments with which his vote on that occasion was in conflict, thus furnishing ground to suspect that some improper influence had been exerted to bias the said member's official action as a member of this House: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and investigate whether any improper attempts have been or are being made, directly or indirectly, by any person connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any other person acting with their advice or consent, to influence the action of any member of this House, upon any questions or measure upon which the House has acted, or which is now under consideration, with power to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is, that the gentleman from New York made the remarks which he submitted before the question of order was raised. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir; if the Chair will look to the minutes of that day's proceedings on the Journal, he will see that he is mistaken; and if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] were in the House I know he would sustain my recollection, which is very distinct, that when the resolution was first presented the gentleman from New York asked permission to make a personal explanation; it was objected to; he then introduced the resolution as a question of privilege; the gentleman from Kentucky made objection, and the Chair then decided that the House must determine whether it was a question of privilege or not, and awarded the floor to the gentleman, and he made his remarks, which were immediately replied to by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT.] I am satisfied that the Journal will show these to be the facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is aware that the Journal would not show whether there was debate or not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of that. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] is now in his seat, and I desire his attention for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from New York is entitled to proceed. The gentleman from New York had the floor some days since, and no objection was made to his proceeding. He yielded the floor that a motion might be made to postpone the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the Chair not in error about the facts of the case?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is stating a question of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the attention of the Chair to this point.

Mr. GROW. Has an appeal been taken from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman addressed the House after the question was submitted.

Mr. GROW. I insist on my question. Does the gentleman appeal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Alabama intends to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GROW. I object to debate unless there is an appeal taken.

The SPEAKER. In addition to what the Chair has already stated, the Chair thinks that the modification which the gentleman from New York submits entitles him to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to raise a question of order; and if the Chair decides against me, I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair. It is a difficult and embarrassing matter to take an appeal about, because it depends upon a proper recollection of the facts of the case. But there are gentlemen here who will remember, I have no doubt, what I now propose to state. When the resolution was originally presented by the gentleman from New York, the Chair submitted it to the House to determine whether it was a question of privilege, and decided that that question was debatable. The gentleman from New York, under those circumstances, made his speech, and finished it to his own satisfaction. He was replied to by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] and then the question went over. Now, I never intended to allow the gentleman from New York to take the floor and make another speech upon this subject without objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Perhaps the Chair will recollect that when the gentleman from New York was attempting to make a speech I objected to his proceeding until the Chair should have decided whether it was a question of privilege or not. The Chair then said, that following the precedent set a day or two before, he would leave it to the House to determine that question, and that the question was debatable. The Chair also said that he had looked into the precedents and found that they sustained the decision made some days before. The gentleman from New York then made a speech, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] replied to it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from New York will give way for that purpose, I will move to postpone this resolution.

Mr. BURNS. I do not want it postponed. I want it considered now.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, sir, there are a couple of thousand men out among the snows of Utah that must be assisted. The House has set the Army bill for this day. I regard that as a much more important question than this, and I move to postpone it for one month.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make that motion pending the appeal.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Is my motion not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I will make it as soon as it is in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is it in order to move to lay the whole subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The effect would be to deprive the gentleman from New York of his right to speak, in case the decision of the Chair should be sustained. The Chair decides, according to his recollection of the facts, and in consequence of the modification of the preamble, that the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Alabama appeals from the decision of the Chair upon the ground that the gentleman from New York has already once addressed the House upon this question, and is not entitled to address it again upon the same subject until every other gentleman who desires to speak shall first have been heard. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Chair in what the modification of the gentleman from New York consists?

The SPEAKER. The modification is to the preamble of the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say, in regard to that part of the grounds for the decision of the Chair, that I do not think it good, for this reason: that as soon as the Chair awarded the floor to the gentleman from New York I at once rose, and before the modification was read I objected to his speaking, and claimed the floor.

Mr. LEITER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to know whether it is not in order to postpone the whole subject in order to get at the bill in reference to the Army?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HOUSTON. If, by the withdrawal of my appeal, the Chair will then entertain the gentleman's motion to postpone the whole question, I will, for the present, withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOARD] is entitled to the floor. If he yields the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] the motion can be made.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not wish to deprive myself of the right to make the point of order hereafter.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman to yield me the floor to make the motion to postpone the subject.

Mr. HOARD. If it be the desire of the House, I have no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to postpone the subject for a month from to-day.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. BURNETT. Is the motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. To a limited extent.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I have this to say: that I do hope that the House will not postpone the consideration of the subject, for this reason: it is due to the member against whom an imputation has been made that he should have a hearing. It is due to him that this question should be disposed of in some way; and, in my judgment, it is not treating that member with justice for the House to postpone the matter against his wish. It is due to him that he should be heard, and that this thing should be disposed of by the House finally in some way or other. The postponement of it from time to time is not dealing with him justly. Hence, I ask the House not to postpone the question, but to dispose of it at once.

There is another reason why it should not be postponed. The charge that has been made by the gentleman from New York, in which he places himself as the prosecutor, has gone forth to the country. His resolution has been published throughout the extent of the country. Comments have been made upon it by the newspaper press prejudicial to the gentleman from Ohio. His reputation will not suffer in the estimation of those who are fair men, and who understand the facts. Still, the gentleman from Ohio ought to have the benefit of having the entire question disposed of. I have no doubt myself, from facts within my knowledge, that the charge is as baseless as it is possible for a charge to be; and, if I were permitted to give my opinion in regard to it, I would say that the charge was not only baseless, but was as contemptible a charge as could be made. It could have been prompted by no desire—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky must confine himself strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. BURNETT. I say, sir, that the postponement of the charge will result in doing injustice to the gentleman from Ohio, because it will enable the member who, in my judgment, was prompted by malice—

Mr. HOARD. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. BURNETT. The postponement of the question would enable the gentleman who made the charge to have the full benefit of it, in breaking down and destroying the reputation of the gentleman from Ohio, who is, in my judgment, fully his equal in every respect.

Mr. HOARD. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOARD. I have twice disclaimed having any personal hostility or unkindness towards the member from Ohio.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; the gentleman has a right to make the disclaimer, and I give him the benefit of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky must confine himself strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. BURNETT. It is somewhat embarrassing, but I will endeavor to do so. The gentleman says that he disclaims anything like personal feeling in the matter. That may be so; I will not say that it is not so. But I do say, that the manner and mode in which the charge was made, and the circumstances attending it, will not make any bad impression on the mind of any man acquainted with the facts. I hope that this House will not postpone the matter, but will dispose of it at once, and give the gentleman from Ohio a full and fair hearing. Would that I had been permitted to notice some other matters, not exactly connected with the postponement of the question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Certainly nothing was further from my intention than by my motion to operate any injustice to the party whose conduct is called in question by the proceedings.

My only object is to get the matter out of the way, so as to get at the Army bill. I have nothing to do with this charge. I know nothing about the facts, and have no correspondence or connection with the person who made the charge. I would not do any injustice to the gentleman from Ohio; and since I understand, from his action and from the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. BURNETT,] that there is a desire, on the part of the gentleman from Ohio, that there should be an investigation under this resolution, I hope that, when I withdraw the motion for postponement, members on all sides of the House will, without going into a debate that is to consume another day or two unprofitably, vote the resolution and have the investigation.

Mr. BURNS, (in his seat.) I do not want it in that form. I want to offer a new proposition myself.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. All I ask is that the House will take this thing, in some form, out of the way.

Mr. BURNS took the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNS. The gentleman from New York made a speech the other day in my absence, and I want the permission of the House to rebut it.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Is there not a motion to postpone pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] withdrew it.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I renew the motion to postpone.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman from New York gets the floor and makes his speech, the gentleman from Ohio will be then entitled to the floor. I hope the matter will not be postponed, but will be allowed to go on.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I shall renew the motion to postpone this question before the House. I do it upon the principle that one is a national question of great importance; and the other is purely a personal one in its importance; and it is better that the gentleman from Ohio should suffer personally, than that two thousand men, locked up in the mountains, shall take their chances, and strong chances, of being cut off by an enemy. This question ought to be considered and acted upon by the House; but, sir, it is wholly in reference to the fact that one is a national question in its character and the other personal, that I renew the motion to postpone.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his motion to postpone, and allow my friend from Ohio [Mr. BURNS] to speak for a few minutes upon the merits of the question.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOARD] is then entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Then I hope the gentleman from New York will yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. HOARD. I will, with great pleasure.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that on last Friday was a week, the member from New York [Mr. HOARD] mounted the Clerk's stand in this House, and read a paragraph from the New York Tribune, insinuating collusion between the President and myself. I pronounced it then, as I do this day, a base slander. The slang had no signature to it, and he refused to indorse it; there was no defendant to the action of course. The House refused to take cognizance of it.

I had hoped that members of Congress, if they should differ in politics or otherwise, would endeavor to act towards each other as gentlemen; if they should happen to do each other an injury at the impulse or through misinformation, they would retract. Under that belief, I addressed a note to the member from New York, desiring him to examine into the truth or falsity of the insinuations; if he found me innocent, to rise in his place, and set me right before the House. I was in my seat all day on Thursday, after I had addressed him the card, and he did not make a motion in regard to it.

But on last Friday, whilst I was confined to my room, and out of my seat, the member saw fit to bring my card into this House, and, instead of complying with the request contained in my note, he reported it to this House, as the proceedings show, and made it the basis of his second privileged question; instead of endeavoring to fasten, or make good the insinuation against the President and myself, as set forth in his Tribune paragraph, he introduced a new charge or insinuation against me alone, "by a statement made by a member of this House that I was to have certain official patronage or appointments in consideration," &c.

Again: making a running insinuation, guerrilla fashion, without giving the member's name, or indorsing the truth of the insinuation himself.

Mr. Speaker, when I addressed the note to the member from New York, I did not intend to have it come into this House. It was addressed to him with the understanding on my part, that if he did not agree to set me right, he should drop me a note to that effect, and not run into this House with it, to be screened by the rules of this House.

It must be manifest to this House that the member intended from the start to make a false and slanderous record against me, to stab my private character—being all the time cautious to avoid the responsibility or punishment of this House that might ensue had he made direct charges. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, dismiss the member from New York. And I say to this House, that from this date he is at liberty to say or publish anything he may choose against me, on this floor. I shall, in the future, treat him and his slang with the contempt that he and it merit in the estimation of honorable members.

Mr. Speaker, I will state to this House, but not in the way of a reply to the member from New York, that there has been no collusion between the President, nor any of his Cabinet, and myself, in regard to the promise of office, or official patronage in consideration of any vote I have given, or have to give. Nor have I asked him for an appointment for myself, or any connection on earth, since I have taken my seat in this Congress. Nor did the President, or any of his Cabinet, or any person for them, either directly or indirectly, promise me an appointment for any friend.

It is true, that I filed an application ten months since, for a gentleman in my congressional district, for the office of marshal in the northern district of Ohio. I called on the President but once in his behalf since I have taken my seat, and that in company with my friend. But the President made no promise that he would appoint him, but did promise to give his claim a favorable consideration when the vacancy would occur, which will be in this month.

I now renew the question of privilege, and move the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas the gentleman from New York, the Hon. Mr. HOARD, read from the Clerk's desk the following paragraph from the New York Tribune, of the 11th of February, to wit:

"WASHINGTON, Wednesday, February 10, 1858.

"I learn that until Monday morning it was expected that BURNS, of Ohio, would vote against the Leecomptonites. On the morning of that day, however, he came to another perception of his duty, on the understanding with the President that his son-in-law should retain the valuable place of post-master at Keokuk, Iowa, and that he himself should be gratified with the office of marshal of the northern district of Ohio, when his present term in the House is completed."

Resolved, That a committee of five persons be appointed by the Speaker, to inquire if there was any collusion or bargain made between the said Mr. BURNS and the President, that if he, BURNS, would vote to refer the President's Kansas message to the standing Committee on Territories, that the said BURNS's son-in-law should retain the position of post-master at Keokuk, Iowa, and also that he, the said BURNS, should be gratified, or appointed marshal of the northern district of Ohio, after his present term in the House expired; and to further investigate whether improper attempts have been, or are being made, directly or indirectly, by any person connected with the Executive Departments of this Government, or by any other person with their advice and consent, to interfere with the action of any member of this House, upon any question or measure upon which the House acted, or which it has under consideration, with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I rise to make an inquiry as to what is the question pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Shall the preamble and resolution be received as a question of privilege?"

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman from Georgia, I understand, has renewed the motion to postpone. I have something to say on that motion.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I did renew the motion to postpone this question for one month.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state, in reference to the question raised a moment ago by the gentleman from Alabama, that it appears from the Globe of the 29th of February, which has been placed in the hands of the Chair, that the recollection of the gentleman from Alabama is correct, and that of the Chair incorrect. The report in the Globe shows that the gentleman from New York did address the House after the question was propounded, "Shall the resolution be received as a question of privilege?"

Mr. HOARD. But there has been a modification proposed since that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York himself proposed the modification.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his proposition, and accept the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, and let it be adopted by general consent.

Mr. GROW. Let the investigation be a general one, and not confined solely to the particulars named in the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New York has not the right to address the House, having addressed the House once already on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. The gentleman from New York has modified his resolution. The Chair was not in order in awarding the floor to the gentleman when the gentleman from Alabama claimed it. The Chair has since discovered that the gentleman addressed the House when his resolution was submitted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit a question of order. In the first place it is not the gentleman's resolution that is before us. The question is whether the resolution is privileged or not, which is a question submitted by the Speaker and not by the gentleman. The gentleman from New York has made a speech on that question, and the rule provides that no member shall address the House more than once until every member who desires to speak shall have spoken on the question pending. Secondly, I hold that if the gentleman's resolution is before the House he cannot so modify it as to give himself an opportunity for an additional speech or speeches. If he is now entitled to speak under this modification he may speak fifty-nine minutes, make another modification, claim the floor and speak another fifty-nine minutes, and so on ad infinitum.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Has not the Chair decided the question? If so, and the gentleman is dissatisfied, let him appeal.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The proposition before the House is identical with the one on which the gentleman made his former speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The proposition, as now submitted to the House by the Chair, is different from that submitted before.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand the motion before the House to be a motion to postpone the whole subject. If that is the motion, is the gentleman, then, entitled to the floor to make an argument on the general merits of the case? The gentleman from Georgia renewed the motion to postpone, I am sure.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I did renew the motion to postpone the subject for one month.

Mr. GROW. It seems that everybody is entitled to the floor, except the gentleman from New York; and the Chair decides that he has the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that unless the gentleman from New York yielded the floor for that purpose, the gentleman from Georgia had no right to move to postpone.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. The gentleman from Georgia understood at the time that he had the floor to make the motion. The gentleman from New York has been recognized by the Chair since the motion to postpone was made.

Mr. SAVAGE. The gentleman from Kentucky withdrew the motion to postpone, and the gentleman from Georgia renewed it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then, if the gentleman from Kentucky had the floor to withdraw the motion to postpone, certainly the gentleman from Georgia had the floor to renew it.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Kentucky made the motion to postpone, he did so with the permission of the gentleman from New York, who yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOARD. I feel it due to myself to repeat what I have stated twice already. In the motion I have submitted I was not actuated by any partisan spirit, or any feeling of unkindness to any man. What I read was as a part of the evidence going to make up common fame. I did not know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURNS] at the time. At the first opportunity which presented itself, I disclaimed any personal hostility to him.

There seems to be a disposition on the part of certain gentlemen to turn the attention of the House from a matter of great general interest to one of personal concern between the gentleman from Ohio and myself. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] is reputed to have made some offensive remarks to me, which were, I believe, predicated upon a mistaken understanding of the facts. Certainly this is not a time when there should be a studied effort to incite difficulties and hostilities between members. I see no reason why there should be any unkindness. Let me say to the gentleman, that while I will pray not to be led into temptation, I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will pray to be delivered from evil.

I will, as briefly as I can, endeavor to present this case to the House. In passing, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURNS] that, before I had taken my seat at the time I offered the first resolution, word came to me that a gentleman from Illinois had twice tried to get the floor, to confirm some of the statements of the article from which I quoted. It was because of this, and other facts which had been communicated to me, that I took the action afterwards which I did. I am not here to wound the reputation of any gentleman. I hope no man is here desiring to wound my reputation.

I will further say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BURNS,] that before I take my seat I will give to him and to the House the name of the gentleman from whom this comes. It is due to the gentleman that he should know that the reason why I could not retract when he asked me to do so, was because of information which I had received. When I first offered the resolution calling for a committee, I knew that two committees had been raised by this House for the purpose of investigations upon common newspaper reports, and I therefore thought it proper to move for a general investigation into a matter in which every gentleman here is certainly as deeply interested as I am. In the case of Lawrence, Stone & Co., in which a committee was raised, no name had been mentioned, either in the House or out of it, in connection with that matter. It was a mere newspaper statement that $87,000 had been charged upon the books of the firm as having been used to procure the passage of a bill through Congress. That simple statement, sir, was considered a sufficient ground for raising a committee of investigation. Having this example before me, the House having shown a disposition to take care of its character and to refute all charges affecting its dignity and purity, I did not suppose, when I introduced the resolution, that any resistance or opposition would be made to it. I stated to the House what I knew, and what I have never since heard disputed, that common fame charged that political influences would carry the Leocompton measure through the House, and that fears were expressed on the other side that such would be the case. I introduce the following authorities to show that common fame is good ground of inquiry:

"MR. MONTAGU. It was not for want of zeal that I did not trouble you the last debate. I am sensible of the miseries we lie under through the loss of our bill in the Lords' House. It has been always the privilege of the House of Commons to use common fame as an information of things. The best of Parliaments have done it, and the best of Kings have granted it. Common fame says that 'Lord Halifax advised,' and since, he has owned, the dissolution of the last Parliament. I think, therefore, that in justice you can do no less than vote him an enemy to the King and kingdom, and address his Majesty that he would be pleased to remove George, Earl of Halifax, from his councils."

"You are told 'it is not fit to accuse a man barely upon common fame.' There is a great difference between common fame and rumor. Rumor is vox plebis, (the vulgar;) but common fame is vox populi—everybody is convinced of it, and in his own mind he bears the conviction of it to be true. He is suspected not only by common characters but actions. In the best and most sedate times, Parliaments have always proceeded upon this of common fame. Henry IV. was no weak prince, and not much in awe of his subjects; but the Lords and Commons represented to the King their desires that he would remove an abbot from him, and another of his bedchamber. The King said 'he knew no fault in them; but because they were odious to his people, he would remove them.' In Henry VI.'s time, De La Pole, Duke of Suffolk, upon common fame that he was not a true man, came in to justify himself; and though some were of opinion he should not be committed; yet no man but that he should be removed. In the late King's time, all the knowing men of that time—Lord Strafford, Mr. Mason, &c., were of opinion that common fame was a sufficient ground to address the King for the removal of a person. I am afraid that, in the case of this Lord, common fame is in the right, and, therefore, my opinion is, to address the King, that he may be removed."

"SIR FRANCIS WINNINGTON. I think those words, 'clandestine and private,' are liable to objections. But I am surprised that gentlemen should be so rigorous to-day, when the address is resolved. I thank God I have this quality, and I hope I ever shall keep it, to speak my mind plainly; and if we speak not now, we are all undone. Though I have a great honor for this Lord, to alter our minds by the intermission of one Sunday, is a great reflection upon us, to be unsettled in our mind. It was the defamation of the House of Commons the last twenty years, that they did neither consider the interest of God, nor of their country; but now to see a tenderness, when a great person is concerned! (Though he has many good qualities, yet I am sorry to see so much cooling in this, when all is at stake.) But this address is not a 'judgment' upon this Lord, (as is said.) I say it is no judgment at all; but the House, upon common fame, believes that Lord Halifax did advise the dissolution of the last Parliament, though he said he was against the prorogation. This is no judging him; he has given ill counsel to the King, and we are going to give him good. As for impeachment, though common fame is no ground to convict, yet it is to accuse. If you cannot relieve yourselves upon common fame, where you can have no witness, you will never remove any man. You have a ground for this address, though not for judgment. We come from all parts of the kingdom, and must hear the opinion of the people. I am for leaving out the words 'clandestine and secret,' because it has been open. We are the great council of the kingdom; when we see ill counsel given, and we give good! I am uneasy for a friend, but easy for the kingdom. I would have the words 'clandestine,' &c., left out, and the words 'of dissolution of the last Parliament' in, and I hope you will not reverse your address."

Now, sir, here was a common report, certainly as definite and as full as in the case of Lawrence, Stone & Co., and I supposed that the course which I proposed was well calculated to further the desire of the House to remove the charges resting upon it, and to vindicate its rights and privileges.

Sir, I believe, that in the wandering of the executive department from its constitutional path of duty, is to be found the very germ of all the wrongs which now justly alarm the country. Sir, what is the sum of $87,000 to be expended upon this House in comparison with the millions that may be expended by the Executive? If personal considerations are offered to the members of this House to control their action here, what is the difference whether it be in dollars and cents, or patronage and place?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a legitimate question of privilege. What are the privileges of this House? I suppose the privilege of the House to cover the right to legislate freely, without restraint, without interference, and without external influences of any kind; and I suppose that any measures taken with a view to bias or sway the action of this House by considerations other than of a public nature, are breaches of the privileges of the House, no matter whether they come from a manufacturing company or from the executive department of the Government. This, sir, is a representative Government, and when an individual or an officer of the Government induces a Representative to misrepresent the will of his constituents, he strikes a vital blow at the privileges of the House. I have some authorities here to show that common fame is a sufficient ground for an investigation.

I know it will be said that in the cases reported, common fame charged an offense against a single individual. But I say here, sir, that it is common fame that the Executive now and in years past has operated upon this House to influence its action, and that state of things cannot exist unless some individual has been operated upon. And when it is thus proven that the Executive is influencing this House, it cannot be necessary, it seems to me, for us to take proof as to the man upon whom the effort has been made, or to whom the corrupt proposition has been made, before we have a right to investigate. The investigation is for the very purpose of bringing out that proof.

Now, sir, there are numerous authorities in parliamentary debates to show that there shall be no interference on the part of the Executive to influence, or sway, or bias, the action of the legislative department.

From Gray's Debates, volume I, page 4, I quote:

"SIR THOMAS LITTLETON said: They procure royal assent to a bill before its time—a violation of our privileges."

At that time it was a violation of the privileges of the Commons to procure the royal assent to a measure before its passage.

"SIR THOMAS GOWER said: The Commons took notice that the proceedings were told the King before the time."

"Resolved, nemine contradicente. That no member of this House shall accept of any office or place of profit from the Crown, without the leave of this House, or any promise of any such office or place of profit, during such time as he shall continue a member of this House; [and that all offenders herein shall be expelled this House.]"

But, sir, it is said that there is no precedent for this proceeding. Well, if that be so, it is for the House to establish a precedent, otherwise corruption must go on, and the House will never be able to stop it, I suppose, for want of a precedent. If we depend on precedents, we can never move in a new case, no matter of what magnitude. I hold that we are here to judge of the fitness of things; and that if a new question is presented to-day, we are as competent to decide it as the House of Commons was two hundred years ago. I hold that it is the high duty of this House to investigate this question with all deliberation; and if there is no precedent by which we can arrest the intermeddling of the executive department of the Government with the legislative department, let us establish the precedent now; and do so with all deliberation.

Now, sir, the question presented to the House and to the country is not the narrow, personal question that has been unfortunately sought to be raised between the gentleman from Ohio and myself; but it is the question whether this House has power to redeem and vindicate its power, its rights, and its independence. I trust that no gentleman will be disposed to throw aside that question until the House shall have said to the executive department, "take off your hands;" until the House shall have rid itself of the incubus that has pressed upon it for the last eight years. Are we to say, by our action to-day, that we cannot relieve ourselves of it? Are we to say to the Executive, "Go on; corrupt all you can with the vast Government influence; carry your measures by the power of your patronage; prostitute the Legislature; absorb the Government?" Are we to do that, or are we to establish this as a question of privilege—that this House will, in vindication of its integrity and of its independence, institute the necessary investigations?

If there is no precedent, let us approach this as an original question. Let us weigh it, and let us consider it with the candor and deliberation due to its importance as an original question. If this be not a question of privilege, and one of the highest magnitude, I would like gentlemen to tell me what would constitute such a question? If this is not now technically within the rule of questions of privilege, let us make it one. It is said that no person is named here. Well, the fact being established by common fame that the Executive does intermeddle with the House, brings suspicion upon every opponent of the Administration in the House.

Sir, in moving in this matter, I was not in pursuit of the victim, but of the offender. I was not in pursuit of, nor did I desire to expose or wound the feelings of any man who might be acted upon; but I desired to expose to the country any matter of corruption that might have been perpetrated.

Now, sir, is it possible that we are not to arrest the robber until we can name the person who has been robbed? Is it possible that we may not arrest the assassin until we have named the person who has been assassinated? Sir, I protest that this is a question of privilege, within the fair scope of the authorities, and that it ought to be so settled and determined by this House. I insist that the House owes it to its dignity to declare and establish such rule in this case as will enable investigations to be instituted in all similar cases, as questions of privilege in the future.

Mr. Speaker, will it be competent for me to go into an examination of the consequences of this intermeddling in the legislation of the country, in order to show why an investigation should be had? I desire to present to the House, then, in connection with this general subject, some startling facts, which I hope gentlemen will notice, to show that the House owes it to itself to make this a question of privilege, if it is not already one, in order that it may be saved from further demoralization.

I will state that in 1826 the subject of executive patronage engaged the attention of the Senate; and a committee was very promptly raised to investigate the subject, with the Hon. Thomas H. Benton at its head. In 1834 another committee was raised upon the same subject, with Hon. John C. Calhoun at its head. Now, I propose to state to the House what was the condition of the country, in regard to its expenditures, when Mr. Benton made his report, and how that executive patronage has progressed since that time. When the first report was made upon this subject, by Colonel Benton, in 1826, it contained alarming statements as to the dangerous nature and extent of executive patronage at that time. Mr. Calhoun's report, in 1834, was equally alarming in its statements, and expressed gloomy forebodings. Now, sir, I find that the expenses of the Government, for civil and miscellaneous purposes, in 1800, was seventeen and eight tenths cents per head for the population of the country; and those two items constituted the whole corrupting fund of the Government. In 1810 the same expenses amounted to fourteen and one tenth cents per head; in 1820, twenty-four and five tenths cents; in 1826, when this committee was organized, the expenses had grown to twenty-nine and two tenths cents per head; in 1834, when Mr. Calhoun's committee was raised, the same expenses amounted to twenty-eight and eight tenths cents, something less than was the fact when Mr. Benton's committee reported, showing the effect of the first investigation had been to check the increase of that patronage. But, sir, I go on. In 1840, no action to check this patronage having since been taken, the expenses for civil and miscellaneous purposes had swollen to thirty-one and one tenth cents per head. Now, mark you, in 1850 it had grown to fifty cents; and in 1857, to ninety-three and five tenths! Now, sir, this miscellaneous-expenses account of the Government in 1857—just for pin-money, just for sundries—this corrupting fund, in 1857, exceeded the whole expenses of the Government in 1840 for the support of the Army and Navy, and for civil and miscellaneous purposes.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKER, assistant clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill to provide for the issuing service and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases; in which he was instructed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. HOARD. I repeat, that for the miscellaneous expenses of the Government alone, in 1857, the amount of money paid was greater than for the Army, Navy, the civil list, and miscellaneous purposes in 1840!

Mr. QUITMAN. I call the gentleman from New York to order. I am disposed to indulge the fullest discussion upon the subject; but, sir, from the important business that is to come before the House to-day, I make the point of order, that I do not see what a general discussion on the expenses of the Government has to do with the question under consideration.

Mr. HOARD. I had finished what I had to say upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question of order has been well taken. He thinks the gentleman from New York has wandered off from the direct question before the House.

Mr. HOARD. I promised before I took my seat to give the names of the gentlemen from whom I received the information alluded to at the commencement. I do it for the purpose of relieving myself from any imputation or suspicion of being actuated from malice, or by any improper motive, which I had previously disclaimed. I was informed before I took my seat on the day when I first offered my resolution, and read from the New York Tribune, that Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, had twice endeavored to obtain the floor—and I see by the reported proceedings of that day that he did endeavor to get the floor—to make some confirmation of the truth of the facts alleged, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURNS] denied.

Mr. HOUSTON. State what the gentleman from Illinois was going to say.

Mr. HOARD. Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, tried to get the floor to make the explanation I have referred to. The gentleman from Ohio will remember that the first sentence in the article I read from the Tribune stated that, until a certain day, he was supposed to be against the Lecomptonites. His denial before the House was full against the statements of the Tribune, from the beginning to the end. Mr. HARRIS of Illinois, Mr. MORRIS of Illinois, and Mr. SMITH of Illinois, all of them had informed me, before I received his letter, that, so far as the first statement in the letter to the Tribune was concerned, it certainly was not false. They stated that the gentleman from Ohio had been reckoned to go with them; that he had counseled with them. I only refer to this to show that I am not guilty of the malice which has been charged. Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, did not state to me that he tried to get the floor to make that statement; but I was informed by a member that it was for that purpose he sought the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I think it due to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOARD] to say, that I stated to him what Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, had told me in relation to this matter. My recollection of what Mr. MORRIS stated is substantially what the gentleman alleges. Mr. MORRIS, after Mr. BURNS voted against Mr. HARRIS's resolution, approached Mr. BURNS and inquired about that vote. It had been previously understood that he would vote for the resolution, and against the Lecompton constitution. Mr. MORRIS told him that he was surprised at the vote he had given. Mr. BURNS gave the reason for that vote, substantially as the gentleman from New York has alleged. I consider it due to the gentleman from New York to make this statement publicly before the House. I stated to him what Mr. MORRIS had told me was the conversation which had occurred between Mr. BURNS and himself.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman, I understand, states what the gentleman from Illinois had told him. It is not the gentleman's statement of what took place between himself and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BLAIR. No, sir; I only undertake to state what the gentleman from Illinois told me.

Mr. HOUSTON. If I had known that, I would have objected. I would not have allowed the House to have dignified the statement by receiving it.

Mr. BLAIR. What was the gentleman's remark?

Mr. HOUSTON. My remark was this: that if I had known the statement was not of the gentleman's own knowledge in the matter, I would have objected.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Missouri, to fix the time of the conversation which he has detailed. Did that conversation which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRIS] had with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURNS] occur after the vote of the latter had been given?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir. I think the gentleman from Illinois stated that it occurred several days subsequently.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman has a statement of his own to make, I shall not object; otherwise, I shall. If we are to hear of this conversation between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Ohio, let us hear it from one of the parties involved.

Mr. HOARD. I think it due to myself and the gentleman from Ohio, to make the statements which are now before the House. I believe I have said all I desire to say. As I understand the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, I do not object to it. On the contrary, I accept it as a modification of my own.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall favor the investigation which has been asked. I apprehend that this House should have something to say as to the propriety of this investigation. Investigations are asked almost every day, and committees allowed almost as a matter of course. Gentlemen refrain from objecting to them from what I conceive to be a false sense of delicacy. It may barely be possible that I shall differ from most of the gentlemen surrounding me on this side of the House. I do not think that I shall favor the proposition of my colleague. If I vote against it, and differ from those around me, I only say that, while I mean no disrespect to them, I shall follow the dictates of my own judgment.

When the resolution was originally introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOARD,] I thought it was ill-timed. The reason I thought it ill-timed was, that it was based alone on this extract from a letter to the Tribune:

"WASHINGTON, February 10, 1858.

"I learn that until Monday morning it was expected that BURNS, of Ohio, would vote against the Lecomptonites. On the morning of that day, however, he came to another perception of his duty, on the understanding with the President that his son-in-law should retain the valuable place of postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa, and that he himself should be gratified with the office of marshal of the northern district of Ohio, when his present term in the House is completed."

The common fame to which the gentleman refers is founded upon reports that such and such things are being done round this House; and it is upon these reports he bases the call for an investigation. I shall vote against the investigation upon any such basis. When a question is brought into this House, upon an irresponsible paragraph like this, with the statement appended that common fame says so and so, it is below the dignity of this body to notice it, or to make it the subject of serious action. Why, sir, take up the partisan press of the day. Something was said against it by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] much of which was just and proper. There is not a day but that each and every member of this body is arraigned in an offensive manner. Men are made patriots of, who have no virtue; and men are called rascals, who have virtues. Motives are conjectured by correspondents, and their conjecture is given with a verity that too often induces the public to swallow it as a truth, in regard to the action of this body.

But I desire, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the latter part of the extract from the New York Tribune; and it gives me pleasure, differing with my colleague politically, as I do, and regretting the vote which he thought proper to give here the other day—it gives me pleasure to bear testimony here in my place, as his political opponent, that the latter part of this paragraph is, within my own knowledge, false and unjust to my colleague.

I know, sir, that he never looked to be marshal for the northern district of Ohio. I do know, as he has very frankly stated, that long before this Lecompton question came before the House in its present shape, he was the friend, and the honest friend, of another gentleman for that position.

Now, Mr. Speaker, knowing this fact as I do, am I, as a Representative, acting under my oath of office to come here, and, for a purpose which it is not necessary for me to speak of, to say by my vote that I will sanction an investigation into the conduct of my colleague based upon a statement, one half of which I know to be false? I never will.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this question has been pending for some time, and it has been discussed in this House in connection with the action of the Executive in reference to questions pending here. If I transcend the limits of debate in referring to this Lecompton matter, I hope I shall be corrected. I do not wish to do it. I say that the fact that the President is in favor of this Lecompton measure is patent. You have the evidence of that fact upon your desk. What else do we know? We know that when political parties have the control of this Government, and when they marshal themselves in favor of a political measure, the Executive of the nation, the representative of the great controlling party, seeks to accomplish a national purpose. We know, without investigation, that the power and patronage of this Government are brought to bear to effect that object, not, perhaps, in a direct and offensive manner, but the recognized doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" is carried out in practice, and an Administration prefers none but its friends. Who does not understand this? Was it ever otherwise in the history of political parties since the days of Jefferson?

Mr. GIDDINGS. With the permission of my colleague, I will tell him of one instance. I once heard my old friend, John Quincy Adams charged with having perverted his patronage to the support of his party. He rose here, in the presence of this body, and declared that he had never advised the appointment of any man in any Department of this Government save one, and that was when his honor, Judge McLean, was Postmaster General of the United States. An old friend of Mr. Adams, and a friend of his father, called on him, and he wrote a note to Mr. McLean, saying that he should by very much gratified to have this friend appointed a deputy postmaster. Mr. McLean returned, for answer, that the man was unfit for the position, and refused to appoint him; and that was the end of it.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I know there are solitary exceptions. My colleague's recollection goes further back than mine, but I can give him a fresher instance than the one he has referred to—an instance where a dominant majority of this House retained in office a political opponent. But such instances are like springs of water in the desert, to which the traveler resorts when thirst impels him to seek relief; the general rule is the other way.

Mr. GIDDINGS. So much the worse.

Mr. NICHOLS. Who expects otherwise? I do not, for one, certainly. When my colleague says so much the worse, I respond heartily to it. I say, Mr. Speaker, so much the worse. It is this principle, this disposition to reward the victors with the spoils, which is doing more to corrupt this Government than anything else which affects its interests. I have no quarrel with my friend about that. But the point I make in this case is this: is there sufficient in the charge itself to warrant this House, a grave, deliberative body, in ordering an investigation based upon a newspaper paragraph, even though my colleague [Mr. BURNS] desires it? I say, for one, that I will act upon nothing of the kind.

But other things have been said here. It is said that my honorable colleague was opposed to this Lecompton measure. In common with others, sir, I did not anticipate the vote which he saw proper to give upon the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS.] But far be it from me to impute to him in that vote a corrupt exercise of political power upon this floor. I have no desire or disposition to do it. But I believe my colleague has since put it upon record that he did not regard the vote which he cast at that time as decisive of the course which he should pursue upon the final question.

Sir, I recognize the right of my colleague to change his opinion upon any question. Let him do so. How does he hold his seat here? By a tenure of power over which we have no control. He is the responsible Representative of over one hundred thousand freemen. To them he is responsible; and, when the final vote shall be taken upon this question, if the vote of my colleague be against the sentiments of those he represents, rest assured—the political history of the past two or three years is fruitful in suggestions of such things—rest assured that retribution will follow as surely as sunshine follows the night.

Mr. Speaker, I should have had my position somewhat affected by things which have taken place in this discussion to-day, but for one single fact. We have heard it stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOARD,] that he has been informed so and so; that certain gentlemen upon this floor have said that they understood the position of my colleague to be in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, against which he gave his vote the other day. Now, sir, I was unable to ascertain the peculiar reason that the gentleman from New York imputed to my colleague for the change; and I desire to hear it.

Mr. HOARD. I read the paragraph which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURNS] declared to be false from beginning to end; and one of the assertions in that paragraph was, that he had been opposed to the Lecompton constitution till a certain day. On instituting the inquiry which the gentleman from Ohio desired me to make, I learned from three gentlemen with whom I talked, that that particular part of the statement was not false.

Mr. NICHOLS. True, Mr. Speaker; I can very well understand that. But it seems to me that we are fighting about terms. True, my colleague pronounced the whole of the statement false; but I ask any honorable and reasonable gentleman if that statement, made in the midst of excitement, cannot apply and would not apply, if not solely and exclusively, almost exclusively to the corrupt imputation contained in the paragraph? Now, it matters not to me whether the gentleman was against Lecompton, or is so at this time. I take it upon my own personal responsibility to brand a portion of the charge on which this investigation is asked, as untrue. I find no man here saying anything against my colleague, except that he at one time entertained anti-Lecompton sentiments. Now, what next? Is there a responsible name to the charge implicating him with any corruption; or is it settled to this House that my colleague has changed his sentiments on this question at all? No, sir.

Now, sir, order an investigation; and what have you to inquire into? Take the proposition of the gentleman from New York, and pass it on common fame, on common rumor! "Common Rumor!" Where is she? Sitting in your reporters' gallery; squatting like a toad under your desks; lurking about this Hall to catch an unguarded word of a gentleman, and to spread it in the shape of a newspaper paragraph, and send it, like a deadly poison, throughout the land, blasting the reputation of honorable men. Common fame! What is not common fame doing for the country now? Why, it is maligning the fairest fame, and striking down the fairest reputation, as it exalts the worst.

I have spoken of the proposition of the gentleman from New York. Now to the proposition of my colleague. He, after some days and weeks of deliberation and of conversation with members, has allowed himself to be persuaded that an investigation is necessary to relieve his character from the imputation. And he now comes before the House with a proposition for an investigation. I shall vote against it: and why? Because it recites the very paragraph on which the resolution of the gentleman from New York is based. And what does it propose? That a committee shall inquire whether the President of the United States and my colleague ever had any corrupt collusion, or whether the President has ever promised to make him any reward for a certain course which he was to pursue, for a vote which he was to give on a pending question—a question not yet determined. Now, I imagine that I see that committee going to work. What witnesses will it call? My honorable colleague. Who rises in his place and says, on his responsibility as a member, that the charge is not true? The President of the United States? Will it call him and ask him: "Did you, Mr. President, ever promise the gentleman from Ohio to appoint him marshal of the northern district of Ohio, or to give him any other selection? or did you hold out to him any hope of reward for his pursuing a certain course on the Lecompton question?" What do you imagine would the answer be? Where else will the committee go for proof? What will come of the investigation, except the general conclusions of the committee as to the exercise of executive power, and the impropriety of employing it to carry political questions, or affect the legislation of the country? Can you effect anything more? I say, Mr. Speaker, that this investigation will be an anomaly in our Government; an anomaly because resting only on common fame; an anomaly because the peculiar mode of investigation pointed out by my colleague is a very incongruous and singular thing.

I will go as far as the furthest in limiting executive patronage and power. That is the proper direction to give to the matter; and if gentlemen are disposed to employ their time that way, I am willing to join with them. Now, on my own responsibility, I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania well understands that I would extend to him any courtesy that I would extend to any member of this House. But I will not withdraw this motion to accommodate any one.

Mr. GROW. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw his motion.

Mr. NICHOLS declined to withdraw it.

Mr. PHELPS called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HALL, of Massachusetts, and MILLSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-six, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to know whether my colleague [Mr. BURNS] desires to have it laid on the table, or not; and I will vote just as he wants.

Mr. BURNS. I want the investigation, of course.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it would be right to have a call of the House; and I make that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to vote understandingly upon this subject. This resolution has not been received by the House, and I wish to know whether the question is upon laying on the table the question on receiving the resolution, or upon laying on the table the resolution itself?

The SPEAKER. The question presented to the House was, "Shall the resolution be received and entertained upon the ground that the privileges of the House are involved?" The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] moves to lay that question on the table.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If my colleague, who made that motion, were in the Hall, I should appeal to him as a personal favor, to my colleague behind me, [Mr. BURNS,] to withdraw his motion. The country will not understand the matter if this question is laid on the table, as the House understands it.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to know if the question of privilege is not disposed of by the application of my colleague [Mr. BURNS] for a committee? I suppose there is no question as to the privilege if he demands an investigation.

The SPEAKER. That is the very question the House is to determine by its vote upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the House will, in justice to my colleague, vote down the motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buntinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Cockerill, Colfax, Collins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmor, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Hartman, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Millson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Potte, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Waibridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Israel Washburn—80.

So the question, "Shall the resolution be received and entertained on the ground that the privileges of the House are involved?" was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by J. BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. STANTON stated that he was reported in the Globe as having voted in the affirmative on the bill relating to the Navy. If he was so recorded in the Journal, he desired it to be corrected. He voted in the negative.

The Journal was accordingly corrected.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER stated that the business in order was the consideration of the special order for the day; it being the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 313) to provide for a temporary increase of the Army of the United States.

Mr. QUITMAN. If I could, without an apparent neglect of duty, postpone my remarks to a day of better health, I would do so cheerfully. But, sir, under every disadvantage, I feel myself bound to press the consideration of this bill to-day, and I shall make a few explanatory remarks upon the bill now before the House.

Without any further preface, I proceed at once to state that the President of the United States, in his annual message delivered to this House some months ago, has given us information of a state of things in the condition of the country which requires, in his opinion, an additional military force. To that, Mr. Speaker, it is due, in the regular discharge of our duties, to make some response. The President has further, in giving that information, informed us of all the circumstances which render it necessary that we should act upon his recommendation before the spring campaign, if we desire to conform to his wishes and opinions upon the subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is the constitutional right of the President of the United States, not to raise armies, but simply to act as Commander-in-Chief of those armies when raised. The constitutional right to raise armies belongs exclusively to Congress. It is our constitutional power, and ours alone, and also to prescribe the regulations by which they shall be governed. The President of the United States can only recommend to Congress, and present considerations showing the propriety of adding to, changing, or improving the military establishment of the United States. His right consists alone in being Commander-in-Chief of those armies after they are raised, and their regulations prescribed, by authority of Congress. The general delegation of power by the Constitution shows what are his duties, and what powers are excluded from the President. Section eight of the first article of the Constitution of the United States gives to Congress power "to raise and support armies, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions."

Now, the President of the United States has no power to call out the militia, except in pursuance of the rules and regulations laid down by the Congress of the United States. He has no authority to call out volunteers unless authorized by the Congress of the United States. It is consequently the duty of the President and other executive officers of the Government, when, in looking abroad, they find the condition of the country to require an additional force, to present the facts to Congress; and then for Congress to say what shall be the character of that force, and for how long a period it shall be mustered into service. Congress has also to say what shall be the rules and regulations by which that force shall be governed. It is the duty of the Executive to present these matters to Congress. It is our duty to act upon that presentation; and especially is it our duty, when there exists such a state of facts as is now presented, to give him a prompt answer; because, whatever opinions may exist as to the propriety of the military operations of the country, now that they have been entered upon, they should be sustained by an adequate force.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, there are two or three modes in which Congress can raise armies—can create a military force, if they deem it proper that such force shall be authorized. The first is, by increasing the regular military forces which are generally known as the regulars. Secondly, by calling out the militia—the great armed force of the country—the great, mighty power of the citizens, required by the Constitution to be always embodied and armed, subject to be called into the service of the United States in cases of great emergencies when necessary, under the peculiar limits of power conferred by the Constitution. The third mode of raising an army is to call out volunteers—a force which, when used under proper regulations, is as effective as any that can be called into the field.

I now desire to make a few very brief remarks upon the several descriptions of force which may thus be called out. In the first place, I state, as every man will admit, that a regular military power of some kind is necessary for every Government. The idea which sometimes exists among philosophers, that moral force alone can sustain government, is utopian. There must be somewhere an armed force subject to the control and intended for the support of every Government. Where the military establishment is intended to be permanent, where it constitutes an indispensable defense, there, I admit, it should be composed of regulars. Such an establishment may also be regarded as indispensable to preserve an accurate knowledge of the military science and practice essential to a successful prosecution of war.

But, sir, it should in no case exceed that which is demanded as the permanent policy of the country in conducting its military affairs. I was one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believed that, in consequence of the largely-extended lines of our Indian frontier, and the probability that disturbances from this cause would continue for a long time, we might with propriety make some increase to the regular Army. When, however, the service demanded is temporary, it is not necessary, perhaps improper, to increase the regular establishment.

I will turn now to the question of the employment of militia for the service proposed in the communication of the President. The act of 1795 still controls the President's action in respect to the calling out of the militia. It is extremely restrictive in its terms; and to show that it does not provide for the present case, I will read from it:

"That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States, most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders, for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress."

The President, under the Constitution of the United States, is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; but he is Commander-in-Chief of the militia only when they are called into service. And, sir, they are to be called into service only in case the United States shall be invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, and in case the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course. The law further says:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the militia employed in the service of the United States shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States. And that no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, of the militia, shall be compelled to serve more than three months after his arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, nor more than in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which he belongs."

Now, Mr. Speaker, will the power conferred by this act answer the purposes of the present emergency? In Utah there is a rebellious spirit which opposes the Federal officers in taking possession of their offices in order that they may discharge their lawful duties. The President desires that an adequate and efficient force shall accompany these officers. For this purpose he cannot call out the militia. They can only be called out for three months; and they would, if called out, be entitled to their discharge before they arrived on the field of active service.

Much has been said, in other places, about the great expense of the volunteer and militia systems. I admit that this applies to the militia system; but I will presently endeavor to show that it does not apply to the volunteer system. It applies to the militia system, for the simple reason that the President of the United States can only call them into the service for three months, in which the short period of service, outfit, and expense of calling them out, would swell the cost to that of more than one year's service. And besides that, they must be called out as found organized in the States. You do not get picked men, not volunteers, not officers selected for the occasion, who have come forward ready to serve in the emergency; but you must take them as they are organized in the States, under officers selected in time of peace and when there was no expectation of war. I acknowledge that the expenses of the pure militia system are much greater than those of any other system. But, even if that were not so, and you were disposed to give the President power to call out the militia, it is utterly impracticable to do so under the law which governs the President in calling them out. We cannot, therefore, refer him to the militia of the country. Important as that service is, under every republican system, it was not intended for emergencies of this kind.

Having shown that it is unwise and impolitic to increase the regular Army for temporary purposes, I might say further, that it has been our policy, and is the policy of all nations that have a regular permanent military establishment, to preserve it in its skeleton form; and if we were to fill up that skeleton now, we should be obliged to adopt some other system in case of a war with some great Power. I believe, therefore, that the system of increasing the permanent military establishment of the country—the regular service—ought not to be resorted to for temporary objects, when it is anticipated that at the close of the campaign we shall be able to dispense with any extra force and return to our present limited establishment.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to examine what is the proper mode of putting in the possession and under the control of the President a sufficient force to carry out what I see, and what every man must see, to be necessary, whether he approves or disapproves of the course of the Administration or of the War Department—whether he considers the Utah expedition as well and skillfully planned, or faulty as a military enterprise. Whatever we may think of these things, I feel confident that every member of this House will at once see that the exigencies of the country require us to place at the disposal of the President some kind of military force. It would be a disgrace to the whole country to leave Colonel Johnston and his men unsupported at a distance from the settled portions of the country. How, then, are we to furnish the President with the additional force that is demanded? Why, sir, there is but one mode, and I am proud to say that it is one which is peculiar to the people of our country, and which has ever proved itself to be effective—I mean a resort to the volunteer system. When the first bugle sounded on the breaking out of the Mexican war, when the people of this country were looking with intense interest to General Taylor's position on the Rio Grande, there sprang up at once, upon the first call of the President, three hundred thousand men from all portions of the country, ready to volunteer and to incur the perils of an unhealthy climate, as well as the hazards of war upon the battle-field.

Now, sir, great men may sometimes mistake the genius and character of our people. I recollect very well having spoken once to Mr. Calhoun upon the subject of a speech delivered by him just prior to the breaking out of the Mexican war, in which he said that he thought it would be extremely difficult for Congress to raise the necessary force to prosecute the war. Even his great mind did not comprehend the adventurous military spirit of the people, nor imagine that upon the first call of the President, ten times the number of men needed would volunteer for that war. Such a thing is unknown in other countries. It shows, in the first place, the devotion of freemen to the honor and the institutions of their country. It shows, further, what has been noted by political philosophers, that republican institutions are best calculated to nourish the military spirit of a people. While Rome was a Republic, she was invincible. While the States of Greece were Republics, they, too, were invincible against all Powers, and against all odds. A republican form of government nourishes that military spirit which, I trust, will ever exist in our own country. It exists here to an extent never known before in any country in the world. We have here this peculiar system; why should we not avail ourselves of it? Who doubts now that the President, on his requisition, could get ten times the number of regiments this bill authorizes him to employ in the service of the United States?

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said by some that volunteers are an inferior description of military force.

Let us examine this charge for a moment. Where do you enlist your regular troops? The statistics show that enlistment is entirely carried on in your great cities. Is it possible that you can there get a class of people for your Army equal to the class of volunteers? The volunteer presents himself from a spirit of military pride. He seeks to gain a reputation in arms. He is ambitious; and looks for an opportunity to elevate himself. He is actuated by a high ambition to distinguish himself. Can you tell me, then, that the recruit from your large cities, and the volunteer, are equal? Compare their intelligence, their spirit—that spirit that impels a man forward in battle; compare their innate courage; compare their knowledge of the use of arms; and who will not, after such a comparison, decide in favor of the material from which is composed the volunteer force of the country? I hold in my hand a paper showing the number of men enlisted in the year ending July, 1857. Out of 5,420 men enlisted in that year, there were enlisted in New York city, of infantry, 649; and of mounted men, 295. In Boston, of infantry, 294; of mounted men, 175. In Philadelphia, of infantry, 633; of mounted men, 156. In Buffalo, 172 infantry. In Baltimore, 126 infantry, and 95 mounted men. This will make 1,876 infantry, and of mounted men, 721; summing up in all to 2,597, raised in the large cities to which I have referred.

This table shows whence the men composing your regular Army are drawn. They are nearly all drawn from the great cities. I am aware, sir, that there is not the same difference between the relative efficiency of military corps, as such, that may be observed between the individuals composing such military bodies, because, in the action of masses of men, discipline constitutes an element of their efficiency; but show me what reason is there why volunteer troops should not, and do not act in large masses as well as regular troops? The very fact that the volunteer will not enlist, but will cheerfully volunteer, shows the spirit that animates him, and the object and purpose under which he acts. There is another objection, however, made to volunteers, and that is that they are much more expensive than regular troops; and estimates have been presented from the Adjutant General's department to show that the volunteer force is much more expensive than the regular. In fact it has been reported that the expense of the volunteers called out in 1846, under Mr. Polk's administration, was six times as great as that of the regular troops. I have slightly examined the data on which these estimates are all founded, and while I have not time to dissect them fully, I have seen enough to convince me, that the system of calculation pursued in the matter is wrong, and the deductions not borne out by the facts. How could it be otherwise? The volunteer receives the same pay, receives precisely the same rations as the regular soldier—no more. His expense, when he once gets actually into service, is not one particle greater. He is paid through the regular administration officers of the United States. From the time he is received into the service, therefore, his expense is precisely the same as that of the regular soldier.

How does it happen, then, that the calculations referred to should make out this vast difference in the cost of the two systems? There are gentlemen around me who are conversant with military affairs. There are four or five gentlemen here present in my eye who have been in the service as commanders of regiments, both as volunteers and afterwards as regulars. And I will ask all of them whether they are acquainted with any facts which would justify the conclusion to which these singular and obscure reports have come as to the great difference between the cost of volunteer and regular troops? While I do not feel disposed to attribute to the authors of these reports a disposition to disparage volunteer soldiers, I find the calculations all against them. For instance, they have based their calculations on three-months' men—taking the volunteers and militia together; and then compared the mounted militia man, or the mounted volunteer, with the regular infantry. Is that fair? I believe that the difference between the expense of an infantry regiment and that of a cavalry regiment is as one to five or six. In other words, a cavalry regiment costs five times as much to support it as does an infantry regiment. Why, then, compare the mounted volunteer with the regular infantry-man? Why not compare mounted volunteer regiments with the regular dragoon regiments? I repeat, that I do not attribute to the War Department, or its officers, any intention of misrepresenting this thing to the country; but there exists in all professions some disposition to disparage those who have not reached their science or art by the regular channels. I doubt not these calculations can be shown to be wrong, and that the expense of the volunteer does not, in fact, exceed the expense of the regular soldier, except where the former is called into service for only a very short period of time. It cannot be fair to compare the expense of three-months' men with that of the regular troops who have been enlisted for years.

Now, in the bill which I have before me, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, we propose to give the President authority to accept the services of an efficient military force, to be raised, not for three, but for eighteen months. And with the material which exists in the country—that which was left from the Mexican war, officers and privates—I will predict that the regiments, if called out by the President of the United States, will be as well officered, and the ranks as well filled, if not better, than by any other mode. But, sir, there is another objection, to which I will briefly allude, made to the use of volunteers or militia, which is, that they suffer more from sickness, and are therefore more expensive. The fact that during the Mexican war, in every instance, the first six months' service has been a period of more sickness than any subsequent one, among the volunteers, as brought out in the report of the surgeon general, is an illustration—a fact which, in my opinion, if properly understood, proves nothing. It is not to be denied that the first six months' service of our volunteers during that war was one in which they suffered especially from sickness; but that may be satisfactorily accounted for in the fact that the great body of them were left in the unhealthy and miasmatic climate of the valley of the Rio Grande, inactive and dispirited, while the regular troops were carried forward to participate in the excitement and glory of the campaign in a hilly and mountainous country.

I had the honor to be selected to command a brigade of volunteers on that occasion. I remember well that while the men were left in the low lands of the Rio Grande, much disease prevailed; and even when the march to Monterey commenced, many of them fell sick on the march, and had to be carried in wagons until, at last, so large a number had contracted disease from their halt in the valley of the Rio Grande that it became necessary to make room for them in the wagons by throwing away our tent poles and other bulky articles.

But no sooner had we ascended into a mountainous country, and excitement increased, than the soldiers began rapidly to recover; and when the first gun on our approach to Monterey boomed in the distance, scarcely a man was to be found in the wagons, but all hastened with life and alacrity to buckle on their equipments, seize their rifles or muskets, and fall into the ranks. After the battle of Monterey scarce a man was reported on the sick list from disease. It was the long detention of so large a body of volunteers in the fatal climate of the Rio Grande that was the cause of so much sickness of the volunteers. In such a climate, measles, and other diseases which are considered very light at home, become in the Army epidemics of the most fatal character. I am ready to admit that during the first few months of service, volunteers are more subject to disease than are regulars generally; but I question whether the period spoken of furnishes a proper comparison between the condition of the volunteer and regular forces in the Mexican war. Most of the volunteer force, amounting to, I believe, about twenty-five thousand men, were left on the Rio Grande, while the regulars were, without any exception, marched forward immediately to Monterey. The volunteer force carried forward consisted of a thousand men who were under my command, and another thousand men under the command of General Hamar.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other objections which are sometimes made to the volunteer system. I would gladly relieve myself from making any comparisons if they had not already, as I think very injudiciously, been made by others. I think they are very injurious to both arms of the service. I know from personal experience, having commanded both volunteer and regular forces, that a mixture of the two descriptions of troops makes the most formidable force in the world. You have that systematic science which exists in the Army, together with that implicit obedience that exists in the ranks, mixed with that intelligence which is picked up from civil life, with that ambition, spirit, and life which are infused into the regular Army by this conjunction with volunteers. You have that bold standard of courage which, being infused through the whole Army, made our force in Mexico such as the world has rarely seen—the army that under the gallant Taylor went forward and achieved victories from Palo Alto to Buena Vista, and that army which marched under the banner of Scott from Vera Cruz and fixed the standard of our country upon the imperial halls of the Montezumas, and performed military exploits which in the history of the world have rarely been equaled and never surpassed.

And why was it? It was because in that army were infused and mingled together system and high military science, with that genius and courage of which our country has so much to boast. Why, sir, the country boy volunteers for the field, knowing that if a blot or stain falls upon his character as a man of courage or honor, he dare never go home. Even the girls would never permit him to associate with them. He knows, therefore, that death is far better than the disgrace which will fall upon him if he should show the white feather. I see around me comrades who can bear me witness that these volunteers went into the service knowing that defeat would bring disgrace upon them and the country. This, then, is the spirit which pervaded the Army, connected with the science and steadfastness of the regular troops, and this it was that gave the results brought about by the different campaigns. I therefore deprecate that there has ever been introduced into these Halls comparisons, unjust comparisons, between the two. I am a friend of both. I am disposed to do justice to both, and I would not have said one word in disparagement of either, or even to introduce a comparison, but for the remarks which have elsewhere been made upon the subject.

It is said that the volunteers are more wasteful. It may be where they have property under their control; but during the whole war, after the volunteers were called out, the administrative department of the army was generally administered by regular officers. I will ask my friends who were in the Mexican war, whether the good things which came to the commissary's and quartermaster's department were more accessible to the volunteer than to the regular soldier? I ask them whether the volunteers had not even more difficulty in obtaining medical stores? There was, then, no opportunity afforded for waste. The stores were dealt out by the administrative officers of the army, and no men watched the property of the Government with more fidelity than they did.

It is said that the volunteers are inadequate for the service. I regret that I have to notice certain charges in the speech of an honorable Senator. He certainly was in error when he stated that the Tennessee regiments fled on the first fire at Cerro Gordo. The strongest position attacked was that against which the troops under General Pillow were marched. It was a position which the Mexicans had prepared for defense, to prevent our troops turning any portion of their works. They were better prepared for defense there than at any other part of the field. The underbrush had been cut down for three or four hundred yards in front of their batteries; and the obstructions which were occasioned by the trunks and limbs of trees which had been felled, were left on the ground to impede the advance of an assailant. No troops on earth could have reached those batteries, unless with a loss of more than three fourths of their force.

For such a failure, I do not think that volunteers, or any other troops, should be held responsible. I was an eye-witness, on another field, of the efficiency, steadiness, and gallantry of volunteers. The gallant Mississippi and first Tennessee regiments, under Colonel Jefferson Davis and Colonel Campbell, marched for two miles under an unceasing fire, and carried the works upon the east side of the city of Monterey, from which—and I say it without desiring to reflect upon the regulars—the regular force, superior in numbers, had been repulsed. I say they were repulsed, because the fact is true. They were repulsed; but it was with immense loss. They fought long and well; a great number of officers fell. No troops could have fought better than Colonel Garland's; yet they were repulsed, and the batteries were carried by my brigade of volunteers. Tell me, then, about the volunteers running on the first fire! The whole conduct of the volunteers does not warrant the charge.

Another charge is, that they are destructive of public property. It is my duty, of all other men, to deny this charge. I commanded volunteers during the whole period of my service in Mexico, and I have some experience in the matter. I can express my confident belief that never was there an invading army to whose charge could be laid so few depredations upon private property. So far as my observation extends, wherever they marched, the volunteers left behind them smiling villages and a happy people. In the first portion of my service, I commanded a field brigade of volunteers, and in the latter portion a division of volunteers; and I will say, what I am ready to stake my character on, that $100 would cover all the injury to private property uncompensated, except in battle.

It is said that when they occupied Santa Anna's palace, they cut and slashed pictures, and other furniture. This may be so, but I do not know it, and do not believe it. On the 21st of April, 1847, I established my headquarters in the parlor of Santa Anna's palace at Encero. I see before me an officer then under my command, General Moore, of Alabama, who was present on that occasion. An agent of Santa Anna had abandoned the place out of fear of these terrible fellows, "Los Voluntarios!" The house was plainly furnished. When the troops were about leaving it, the younger officers left a note hanging from the chandelier, directed to Santa Anna, informing him that on that anniversary of the battle of San Jacinto, they had availed themselves of his hospitality, and thanking him for it. The rear guard had scarcely got off the ground when the agent returned. He looked about, and saw that nothing had been injured. Immediately he came in post haste, and addressing me thanked me for having left everything as we had found it.

The amount of injury done depends very much, if not altogether, on the amount of restraint which an officer imposes upon his men. But there is a high moral restraint resting upon the volunteers, because they are of our own people. Some of them may brag very largely, and even assume an air of ferocity; but you will find in almost every man of them a heart that bleeds at woman's sorrow, and abhors the infliction of any cruelty. The charge that the volunteers are less humane, and are disposed to do more unnecessary injury than others, is altogether contrary to my experience; and I pronounce it an unjust imputation upon the American character.

Mr. Speaker, I had no intention, when I rose, of trespassing so long upon the attention of the House. I must pass, now, to a brief detail of the provisions of the bill reported. The bill contains, first, a positive provision that a regiment of mounted men shall be raised in Texas for the defense of the frontier of that State. It then goes on to give authority to the President of the United States, should he deem it proper, to call out four regiments of volunteers in any of the adjoining States, or elsewhere, as he may see fit—

"For the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah, for the protection of supply and emigrant trains, and the suppression of Indian hostilities on the northern and northwestern frontiers."

They are to be raised for the specified purposes only—purposes which I believe will be approved by all parties. We all know that the defense of the Texas frontier is necessary. The Governor of Texas has sent information to the Senators and Representatives from that State, and has called upon General Twiggs, commanding that department, to protect the frontier from Indian depredations. General Twiggs has replied that he has no troops for that purpose, a part of his command having been ordered out with the Utah expedition. It is proposed to provide a regiment for that purpose, to be called into the service for eighteen months. They will then pass through two summer campaigns before they are disbanded, and will probably accomplish the purpose for which they are required. We propose, then, to authorize the President, in his discretion, to call for four regiments of infantry or mounted men, as he may prefer, for the purpose of putting an end to the difficulties in Utah, suppressing Indian hostilities, and protecting the emigrant trains across the western plains.

The bill has been matured with great care under the eye of my associates on the committee, four or five of whom have seen service in Mexico, and know what provisions are proper for the organization of this description of force. These details, I believe, meet with the entire approval of the whole committee. Many of the features of the bill have been contained in other bills that have preceded it. The pay is the same as that of the same arm in the regular service, and no more, with the exception that in the case of the Texas regiment the mounted men shall furnish their own horses, and the United States shall pay the hire of those horses. I will not discuss the details of the bill now, but if I am well enough to make any remarks at the close of the debate, I shall endeavor to do so. I think the details of the bill will be satisfactory when they become known.

There is one remark which I omitted to make in reference to the comparison between the policy of relying for temporary purposes upon the regular force and that of accepting the services of volunteers or of the militia, and it is this: during the last year, the regular Army of the United States lost three thousand men by desertion—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I trust the gentleman from Mississippi will have the unanimous consent of the House to proceed. I am sure no gentleman will object.

Mr. KEITT. I trust the House will grant the leave.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It must not be considered as a precedent.

No objection was made.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Speaker, I did not ask for this extension of time, and am, therefore, the more grateful to the House for giving it to me. I merely desire to conclude the remark I was making. It may be that the volunteer service, which I regard as the proper one for temporary purposes, is a little more expensive than the employment of the regular Army, but there are two things to be considered in regard to it. In the first place, it disseminates throughout the country some military knowledge, and places it in the hands of the citizens generally, instead of confining it to the small class of men who are devoted to the profession of arms. Even though it may involve an expense of a few thousand dollars more, this extension of military knowledge and experience will be a benefit to the country in time of need.

But, again, this evil of desertion is a matter worthy of consideration. It is increasing in our Army, and I do not see how it is to be prevented. It cannot be prevented by the infliction of heavier penalties; for no punishment short of death could possibly prevent it, and I doubt very much if even that would; and it would be painful to resort to it when the soldier is not in the presence of the enemy. Never, I believe, has the habit been more rife.

It has been said that Colonel Sumner's regiment lost, in less than three months, four hundred men by desertion. Now you do not hear of volunteers deserting. When did you hear of a single volunteer becoming a deserter, and subjecting himself to be branded as such? They never desert.

But with the regular troops the evil has increased to such an extent as to attract the attention of the country. How is that evil to be remedied? It must be by moral influence; by infusing the regular troops with the spirit that animates the volunteers. The evil may arise, in a great measure, from the fact that the men who compose our regular Army are irresponsible men, who care nothing for the country, or their own characters. Many of them enlist, perhaps, for the purpose of getting the bounty, and with the intention to desert whenever they get to the West; and they do desert, wherever they get into sparsely-settled countries, where there is little chance of being arrested as deserters.

So, Mr. Speaker, taking all these things into consideration, it seems clear to me that we want the volunteers. If we desired to have a permanent force, it might be better to enlist men; but if it is merely wanted temporarily, let us make use of the best force a nation ever had—American volunteers.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting communications from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 5th ultimo, requesting certain information in regard to the number of troops, whether regulars, volunteers, drafted men, or militia, engaged in the service of the United States during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COURT OF CLAIMS REPORTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Court of Claims.

The adverse reports were ordered to be placed upon the Calendar, and the bills referred to the Committee of Claims; being considered read a first and second time.

ORDNANCE OFFICERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting statements of the Fourth and Fifth Auditors of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of 14th June, 1848; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL OF NEBRASKA LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the memorial and joint resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Nebraska, praying appropriations for that Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

MARYLAND CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent presented the reply of Mr. J. Morrison Harris to the memorial of Mr. Whyte, contesting his seat; and asked that the same be ordered to be printed.

It was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BISHOP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARNETT. On that I call for the yeas and nays. It is only half past three o'clock.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] desires the floor to speak on this bill. I hope, therefore, that the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn, and that the gentleman will be heard on the proposition to increase the Army.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair: whether, if the House adjourn at this stage of the proceedings on the Army bill, that will necessarily be the first question to-morrow? and second, whether the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BISHOP,] having obtained the floor and made the motion to adjourn, will have the floor on the Army bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the latter question when the contingency arises. As to the first question, the Chair states that the first business in order in the morning will be the call of the Committee of Claims for reports from the Court of Claims.

Mr. KEITT. Then the first business to-morrow will be, not the Army bill, but the regular course of proceedings on private-bill day?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will it not be the first question on Monday or Tuesday? The reason it will not be the first question to-morrow is because it will be private-bill day.

The SPEAKER. It will come up the first business in order when the morning hour is reached.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Is there a motion to recommitt pending?

The SPEAKER. There is.

The yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes to four, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 5, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the call of the Committee of Claims for reports in reference to business from the Court of Claims.

Mr. BLISS. Before the House proceeds to the regular order, I ask permission to introduce a bill for reference. The subject-matter of the bill has been already referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, namely, the reorganization of the Supreme Court. It was referred, I believe, in the shape of a portion of the message of the President of the United States, on the motion of my colleague, [Mr. STANTON.] I have drawn a bill expressing my views on the subject, and I desire to have it referred to the same committee.

Mr. HARLAN. I object. I think it is a great deal better to pursue the regular order of business.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope there will be no objection to calling the States for bills and resolutions.

ISAAC S. SMITH.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac S. Smith, of Syracuse, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ANNE DUDLEY.

On motion of Mr. MILES, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Anne Dudley, keeper of the light-house at St. Marks, Florida, and that it be laid on the table.

JOHN DAVIS.

Mr. COBB. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill recognizing the assignment of land warrant No. 35,956, issued to John Davis, as valid. It is a very small matter, but to the poor man for whose benefit it is, it is of importance. The land warrant in question was issued to John Davis. He died, and the administrator proceeded to dispose of it under the act of the Legislature of Alabama which treats land warrants as personal property. The administrator proceeded to wind up the estate, sold the warrant, and got the pay for it, to the full amount of the value of the land. Afterwards, it was discovered that, by the decision of the Land Office, land warrants are regarded as real estate, and the title of the party purchasing the land is not recognized.

Mr. BLISS. Is this in order? The rules were applied to me strictly this morning, and I object.

Mr. COBB. Well, sir, I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill, recognizing the assignment of land warrant No. 35,956, issued to John Davis, as valid.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. COBB. Now, sir, I hope the House will pass this little bill. I have stated all the facts in relation to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to know of the gentleman if there is a report in this case?

Mr. COBB. Here is the bill, and I have stated the facts.

Mr. MORGAN. I want something more than that.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether it is in order in calling committees for reports on private bill day to put bills on their passage as they are reported?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is—bills of a private nature.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I was under the impression that on private bill day the rules provided that the bills reported from committees should be referred and not put on their passage. I do not remember any particular construction on this point; but that has been the practice of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is the opinion of the Chair that when a bill of a private nature is reported from a committee, it stands upon the same footing as bills reported from committees on any other day. The restriction of the rule only requires that the bills reported shall be of a private nature.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Does that rule apply on objection day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he should amend the bill, so as to specify under what act this forty-acre warrant was issued. Warrants of the same number, I presume, have been issued under other acts.

Mr. COBB. I am not very particular about this bill. I submitted it to the Commissioner of Public Lands, and he said it was satisfactory. If there is any objection to it, send it back, and let me put it in my drawer; and let the poor man suffer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no objection to the bill; but it should state under what law the warrant was issued. The warrant shows under what act it was issued, and let that be inserted in the bill.

Mr. COBB. Well, here is the warrant.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, then, why not amend it, as I have suggested?

Mr. COBB. Very well; I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Alabama cannot accept an amendment, the bill being a report from a committee. A vote of the House must be taken upon it.

Mr. MORGAN. I would inquire of the gentleman from Alabama if there is not now before the Committee on Public Lands a general bill, which covers this very case? As I understand it, there are a large number of cases of this kind.

Mr. COBB. No, sir. There is a bill before the Committee on Public Lands, proposing to recognize land warrants that have been issued upon application by parties who have applied at the Land Office, but who have died before the action of the Land Office upon them. Under the present law such warrants are worthless. We propose to report a bill recognizing the validity of such warrants, and that they shall descend to the heirs of the applicant. But, sir, this is not a case of that kind; this was issued and in the possession of the party before he died; it was administered upon as his property, and the money distributed among the heirs. But they now find that the Land Office does not recognize land warrants as personal property. That is the whole of it. If you send it back to Alabama it costs thirty-eight dollars to get a legal transfer; that is all of it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If I can get the ear of the House I desire to say, that I have no knowledge of this bill; I presume it to be as meritorious as the gentleman from Alabama states it to be. I presume it is as meritorious as a hundred others reported months ago, and placed upon the Private Calendar, and I therefore rise to move that this bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House and placed upon the Private Calendar. I object to this bill taking precedence of others which have been on the Calendar for months.

Mr. COBB. I am sure, if it is the pleasure of the House to refer this little bill to a Committee of the Whole House, I have no objection.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object to it further, because it has been the practice of the House to refer bills reported on private bill days.

Mr. COBB. Well, just let it go.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB. I do not know how the gentleman from Ohio could be entitled to the floor. I had not yielded the floor, and I do not know how the Chair could have inferred that I had, unless it is from my slow way of speaking.

The SPEAKER. That may have misled the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. Well, sir, I move to put the bill on its passage; and I have nothing further to say.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, asked leave to make a report from the Committee of Claims, he having been absent in the committee room when that committee was called.

Mr. LEITER objected.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I wish to make a single remark. I do not propose to interrupt the proceedings of the House at this time by a speech; but, sir, on yesterday—

Mr. PHELPS. What is before the House? Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. When the Committee of Claims was called it was in session in its committee room on the business of the House. They have several reports to make, and I ask that they be allowed to make them now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana made the same request, and it was objected to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. We make the request only to facilitate the business of the House. It is a matter of no interest to the members of the committee individually.

There was no objection to the reception of reports from the Committee of Claims.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the following petitions; which were laid upon the table, and the reports ordered to be printed:

The petitions and papers of Cole & Barr; and The petition of the heirs of Michael Johnson.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill (C. C. No. 44) for the relief of James Smith, of the county of Clermont, State of Ohio, with the recommendation that it be rejected; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, also, from the same committee, made a similar report on the following Court of Claims bills; which were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Lucinda Robinson, of Orleans county, Vermont;

A bill for the relief of Hannah Weaver, of Wayne county, Pennsylvania;

A bill for the relief of Ann Clark, of Madison county, Tennessee;

A bill for the relief of Mary Burt, of Scioto county, Ohio;

A bill for the relief of Esther Stevens, of Van Buren county, Michigan;

A bill for the relief of Mercy Armstrong, of Gloucester county, Rhode Island;

A bill for the relief of Nancy Madison, of Fairfield county, Ohio;

A bill for the relief of Anna Parrot, of Clinton county, Ohio;

A bill for the relief of Margaret Taylor, of Putnam county, Tennessee;

A bill for the relief of Lavinia Tipton, of White county, Tennessee;

A bill for the relief of Lucretia Wilcox, of Wayne county, Michigan;

A bill for the relief of Mary Robbins, of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania;

A bill for the relief of Tempy Connelly, of Johnson county, Kentucky;

A bill for the relief of Rosamond Robinson, of Belknap county, New Hampshire;

A bill for the relief of Melinda Durkee, of the State of Georgia;

A bill for the relief of Sarah Weed, of Albany county, New York;

A bill for the relief of Mary Pierce, of Cortland county, New York;

A bill for the relief of Ann B. Johnson, of Henrico county, Virginia;

A bill for the relief of Hannah Menzies, of the State of Kentucky;

A bill for the relief of Rebecca P. Nourse, of the State of Kentucky;

A bill for the relief of Anna Hill, of Monroe county, New York;

A bill for the relief of Polly Booth, of Madison county, New York;

A bill for the relief of Sarah Eaton, of Worcester county, Massachusetts;

A bill for the relief of Temperance Childress, of Virginia;

A bill for the relief of Elizabeth King, of Virginia;

A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Morgan, of Rensselaer county, New York;

A bill for the relief of Phebe Polly, of Otsego county, New York;
 A bill for the relief of Nancy Ittig, of Herkimer county, New York;
 A bill for the relief of Mary Ann Hooper, of Virginia;
 A bill for the relief of Almira Reniff, of Pennsylvania;
 A bill for the relief of Sarah Loomis, of New London county, Connecticut;
 A bill for the relief of Mary Grant, of South Carolina;
 A bill for the relief of Jane Martin, of Harrison county, Virginia; and A bill for the relief of Lydia Clapp.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee of Claims, submitted a minority report on the adverse reports just made; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the adverse reports from the Committee of Claims were referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HORACE S. CAMPBELL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report in the case of Horace S. Campbell; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN SAYRE.

Mr. GOODWIN, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Sayre; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. KELLY, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the president and directors of the Panama Railroad Company, praying compensation for furnishing supplies to General Walker's men, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GEORGE W. HOPKINS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of George W. Hopkins; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM MOSS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of William Moss, for additional compensation for mail services; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had this day approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 271) to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

A. M. PETTENGALL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of A. M. Pettengall; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY.

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, made an adverse report on the petition of the Pharmaceutical Society of the District of Columbia, praying for an act of incorporation; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES W. NYE.

Mr. BURNETT, from the same committee, reported a bill for the benefit of J. W. Nye; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. LETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was so referred, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN B. ROPER.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of John B. Roper; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF REV. JAMES CRAIG.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Rev. James Craig, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. COX, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Walker; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL JONES.

Mr. LOVEJOY, from the same committee, reported a bill to allow the legal representatives of Samuel Jones five years' full pay, in lieu of half pay for life; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GUSTAVUS B. HORNER.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Gustavus B. Horner, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THE REVOLUTIONARY ARMY.

Mr. CRAGIN also, from the same committee, reported back House bill (No. 234) to provide for the settlement of the claims of the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, and of the widows and children of those who died in the service; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT BARTLETT HINDS.

Mr. CLAWSON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Bartlett Hinds; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF MARIE MALINES.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Marie Malines; which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. SANDIDGE. It was with great hesitancy and reluctance that the Committee on Private Land Claims, having observed the indisposition of the House to authorize other committees to employ clerks, instructed me to apply to the House for authority to appoint a clerk. The reason for the necessity is simply this: we have now before us a mass of documents, coming from the Territory of New Mexico alone, which, if printed, would make a large volume. It is utterly out of the power of that committee even to read these documents, although we should give to them every leisure hour that we expect to have during the session. We ask for the appointment of a clerk who will make a brief of these papers for the committee. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Claims be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. LETCHER. Is that a private claim?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, and thinks that the resolution cannot be reported today.

Mr. SANDIDGE. It is a report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. That is true, but reports of a private nature only are called for.

CYRENIUS GLASS.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Cyrenius Glass; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

W. K. GREENWOOD.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, presented an adverse report in the case of W. K. Greenwood's appraisal and affidavit; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

JOHN FRANCIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. GREENWOOD also, from the same committee, presented an adverse report on the petition of John Francis and others; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

MENOMONEE INDIANS.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to adjudicate and settle certain claims against the Menomonee Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE CHORPENNING, ETC.

Mr. LEITER, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of George Chorpennning and Elizabeth Woodward, widow of Absalom Woodward, deceased, and the children of said Elizabeth Woodward; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

DENT, VANTINE AND CO.

Mr. SCOTT, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Messrs. Dent, Vantine & Co., for provisions furnished to Indians in California, during the years 1851, 1852, and 1853; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CECILE COMPARE.

Mr. SCOTT, from the same committee, presented an adverse report in the case of Cecile Comparé; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. PAFF.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, presented an adverse report in the case of Captain William P. Paff, for leave to enlist a rifle regiment; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD B. ALEXANDER.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Richard B. Alexander; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

MAJOR JAMES DASHIELL.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Major James Dashiell, paymaster in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

SIMEON STEADMAN.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Simeon Steadman; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

SUSANNAH REDMOND.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Susannah Redmond; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JONAS P. LEVY.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of Jonas P. Levy; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN G. CLAYTON.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of John G. Clayton, for a horse lost by said Clayton in the service of the Government; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

E. W. PALMER AND OTHERS.

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of E. W. Palmer and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

HIRAM PAULDING.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Hiram Paulding; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

BLYTHE ISLAND.

Mr. SEWARD proposed to report back House bill No. 89, relative to the continuation of the United States works at Blythe Island, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. KELSEY. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not, and cannot be received.

JOHN M. BROOK.

Mr. WINSLOW, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of John M. Brook; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS DAINESE.

Mr. BURLINGAME, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Francis Dainese; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES L. DENMAN.

Mr. CLINGMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made an adverse report in the case of Charles L. Denman, United States consul at Acapulco, Mexico; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN stated that he had been requested to make a report for the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SICKLES.] He could not now obtain possession of the bill, and hoped that leave would be given to make the report any time in the course of the day.

PETER VAN BUSKIRK.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill providing an increase of pension for Peter Van Buskirk, of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN HARRIS.

Mr. SEARING, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Harris, of Warren county, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JEMIMA DAMON.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of Jemima Damon, widow of Jedediah Damon; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

W. P. RATHBONE.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina, also from the same committee, reported back the petition of W. P. Rathbone, in behalf of the widow and children of Caleb Wood, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN CAMPBELL.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Campbell; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN STANTON SHOALS.

Mr. BURNS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Captain Stanton Shoals; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

MARY BLATTENBERGER.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill, granting a pension to Mary Blattenberger; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

NANCY MAGILL.

Mr. BURNS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Nancy Magill; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BURNS, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the cases of Mary Thompson, John Ketchum, and John K. Tucker; which were laid on the table, and the reports ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL HAMILTON.

Mr. CASE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report in the case of Samuel Hamilton; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE MIDDLETON.

On motion of Mr. CASE, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George Middleton; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

WILLIAM SUTTON AND JOSEPH WEBB.

Mr. CASE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of William Sutton; and

A bill for the relief of Joseph Webb.

EDWIN M. CHAFFEE.

Mr. EDIE, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Edwin M. Chaffee; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HOUSE PRINTER.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, the Committee on Printing was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of James B. Stedman and Major Knapp; and the same were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

POLICE REGULATIONS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill granting certain additional powers to the corporation of Washington; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. GOODE. This is a bill in which we all feel an interest, and I move that it be recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia, that it may be printed before it is taken up for consideration. I move that it be ordered to be printed.

The bill was ordered to be printed.

JAMES PHELAN.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of James Phelan; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. CHAFFEE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first question in order to be the consideration of adverse report

(C. C. No. 111) upon the petition of Arnold Harris, administrator of Robert Armstrong.

On motion of Mr. CHAFFEE, the report was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that the recommendation of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

AUGUSTINE DEMERS.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 116) upon the petition of Augustine Demers and others, administrators of Francis Chaudonet.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I make the same motion in reference to that case.

Mr. PALMER. The Court of Claims in this case—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate is not in order, this being "objection day."

Mr. PALMER. I desire to have that case take the same direction that was given to cases the other day—that it be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman as objecting to the consideration of the case now?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

JOSHUA R. JEWETT.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 123) upon the petition of Joshua R. Jewett, heir of Joseph Jewett.

Mr. PALMER. I object to that case also.

JAMES THOMPSON.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 126) on the petition of James Thompson, surviving partner of C. M. Strader & Co.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that that case be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT HARRISON.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 127) upon the petition of Robert Harrison.

Mr. HAWKINS. I make the same motion in that case as was made in the last case by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. LEITER. I object to the case.

ABRAHAM KING.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 130) upon the petition of Abraham King, administrator of John Mandeville.

Mr. PALMER. I move that that case be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected to the consideration of the case.

ROBERT C. THOMPSON.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 135) upon the petition of Robert C. Thompson, administrator of William Thompson. [Objected to by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia.]

ELLEN MARTIN.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 139) upon the petition of Ellen Martin, heir-at-law of Francis Martin. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

FRANCIS NADEAU.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 140) upon the petition of Francis Nadeau, heir of Basil Nadeau. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

ABRAHAM R. WOOLLEY.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 141) upon the petition of Abraham R. Woolley.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope that no one will object to this case. I move that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims. I could explain the merits of the case if I had a right to do so.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am willing to give the gentleman the right.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Oh, no; that will not do.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I must object.

NATHANIEL WILLIAMS.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 145) upon the petition of Nathaniel Williams.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the report be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that the decision of the Court of Claims be confirmed.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN HAMILTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Hamilton, of Ohio, the sum of $200 in full compensation for time and services during imprisonment with the Indians during the war of 1812.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

CYRUS H. M'CORMICK.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 11) upon the petition of Cyrus H. McCormick. [Objected to by Mr. HOARD.]

CASSIUS M. CLAY.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 21) upon the petition of Cassius M. Clay. [Objected to by Mr. LEITER.]

WILLIAM NEILL.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 30) upon the petition of William Neill and others. [Objected to by Mr. BURNETT.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It must be perfectly palpable to every gentleman of the committee that we are not going to do anything with this Calendar. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are but two more of these adverse reports, and then we will come to other bills.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. A single objection stops everything.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We have to get at them some day.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, we will take them up some day that is not objection day.

The motion was not agreed to.

THOMAS PHENIX, JR.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 31) upon the petition of Thomas Phenix.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This case of Thomas Phenix has been acted on in the Senate, where a bill was passed in favor of the claimant; and at an early day of this session a bill was introduced here, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which committee has it now under consideration. Although this case comes to us as an adverse report, it is not, in fact, an adverse report from the Court of Claims. But, without discussing the question, I desire to have the report referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which has the case now under consideration.

Mr. PALMER. I am constrained to object. I have no doubt that the case has all the merits which the gentleman claims for it; but my cases have merits also.

DAVID MYERLE.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 81) upon the petition of David Myerle.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the report be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

RICHARD H. WEIGHTMAN.

A bill (H. R. No. 64) for the relief of Richard H. Weightman.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BURNETT. Read the report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the case.

THOMAS SMITHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of Thomas Smithers.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Thomas Smithers upon the invalid pension roll of the Army of the United States, and cause to be paid to him eight dollars per month, commencing January 1, 1855, to continue during his natural life.

The report was read. It appears that, from certificates and documents presented to the committee, the petitioner was an enlisted drummer in Captain Thomas O. Jennings's company of Virginia militia, in the regiment commanded by Major Stapleton Crutchfield; that he entered the service 30th March, 1813, and was discharged with his company on the 11th of October, 1813; that during an engagement at Hampton, Virginia, with the British forces, he received a wound on both legs, between the knees and ankles, caused by a splinter from a baggage wagon, which was shattered by a cannon shot, and that said wound has caused him severe physical suffering during all the time since he received it; and that now, in his extreme old age, (ninety-four,) he applies for that relief which his country guaranteed to him when he entered her service.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES J. INGERSOLL.

A bill (H. R. No. 197) for the relief of Charles J. Ingersoll. [Objected to by Mr. KELSEY.]

GEORGE W. BISCOE.

A bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of George W. Biscoe. [Objected to by Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. It is obvious that nothing will be done in committee. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

JAMES MACM'INTOSH.

A bill (C. C. No. 80) for the relief of Captain James MacMcIntosh, of the United States Navy. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

BARCLAY AND LIVINGSTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 204) to refund to Barclay & Livingston and others, duties on certain goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York on the 19th day of July, 1845. [Objected to by Mr. PHILLIPS.]

HENRY LEEF AND JOHN M'KEE.

A bill (H. R. No. 206) to indemnify Henry Leef and John McKee for illegal seizure of a certain bark. [Objected to by Mr. LOVEJOY.]

ALEXANDER STEVENSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson.

The bill directs the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the legal representatives of Alexander Stevenson, a soldier of the revolutionary war, in trust for the heirs of Stevenson, $654, being the amount of money due him from the time of his enlistment, January 1, 1776, until the time of his discharge, in 1783.

The report states that Alexander Stevenson, a soldier in the Revolution, enlisted as such in the month of February, in the year 1776, was in the battle of the Three Rivers, in Lower Canada, where he was taken prisoner and detained as such till the year 1783, when he was discharged in an enfeebled state of health. It appears from the records of the War Department that he enlisted for one year, and not for during the war; but having served till the end of the war, his case comes within the spirit and meaning of the law providing relief for those who enlisted "for and during the war." From the papers and accompanying testimony it appears he received but one month's pay from the Government, owing to the fact that he was a prisoner from 1776 till 1783. The claim, was presented in 1837, and had the favorable action of two committees; passed the House of Representatives at the last session, with a clause allowing interest upon the arrears of pay, and was objected to in the Senate on the ground that the Government ought not to pay interest, on the presumption that she is always ready to pay all her just debts upon demand. The committee refused to allow interest, even from the time demand was made, although there are precedents to be found justifying such allowance.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM SMITH.

A bill (H. R. No. 209) for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

JAMES LAWRENCE.

A bill (H. R. No. 410) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence.

The bill provides that the assignees or legal representatives of James Lawrence, to whom was issued donation certificate No. 306, under the eighth section of the act of May 24, 1828, entitled "An act to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami canal from Dayton to Lake Erie, and to grant a quantity of land to said State to aid in the construction of the canals authorized by law, and for making donations of land to certain persons in Arkansas Territory," shall be authorized to relocate the same upon any of the public lands in Arkansas, subject to entry at a minimum of not more than $1 25 per acre: provided, that said certificate shall be found to have been issued in conformity with the eighth section of the act of May 24, 1828, and shall be located upon legal subdivisions of land of not less than one quarter section.

The report states, that by treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians west of the Mississippi, ratified the 23d of May, 1828, a portion of the then Territory of Arkansas was ceded to said Indians; and the settlers resident thereon, and who should remove from such settlement according to the terms of the treaty, were, by the eighth section of the act of 24th May, 1828, entitled "An act to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami canal from Dayton to Lake Erie, and to grant a quantity of land to said State to aid in the construction of the canals authorized by law; and for making donations of lands to certain persons in Arkansas Territory," authorized to enter with the proper register of the land office in Arkansas a quantity of land not exceeding two quarter sections. Under this law of Congress, as appears from a communication from the Commissioner of the Land Office, a certificate was issued to James Lawrence, number 306, on claim number 213, which was located at the Little Rock land office, on the 24th July, 1851, on certain lands, and that the location was afterwards set aside because of a prior claim, not shown by the books of the local land office at the date of location, as stated by Mr. Hall, the memorialist, who asks permission to relocate on other lands, he being the assignee of James Lawrence. The time given by the law authorizing the previous location expired before its cancellation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation it do pass.

PIERRE BROUSSARD.

A bill (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I do not object to that bill myself; but inasmuch as my colleague, [Mr. SANDIDGE,] now absent, has received some new communication on the subject, I ask that it be passed over.

N. C. WEEMS.

A bill (H. R. No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana.

The bill provides that the entry of the section sixty-eight, of township two north, of range one east, in the southwestern land district of Louisiana, by N. C. Weems, of that State, and patented September 1, 1849, be confirmed; and that the Commissioner of the Land Office shall cause to be refunded any excess of money paid into the land office in its purchase from the Government.

The report states that on the 1st of September, 1849, a patent (No. 1,341) was issued to N. C. Weems, on receipt numbered 1,280, for section sixty-eight of township two north, of range one east, containing one hundred and eighteen acres and thirteen hundredths of an acre, sold at the Opelousas land office, Louisiana. An excess of money having been paid on this entry, and Mr. Weems applying therefor, he was, after several years' delay, notified that the whole entry would be canceled, on the showing made by the surveyor general of the State, in a communication addressed to the Commissioner of the Land Office in January, 1857, that the land in question (being a back concession) was not on a navigable stream; the right of concession entry being allowed only to the owners of tracts fronting on a navigable stream. Mr. Weems having purchased this land in good faith, and cultivated it for many years, without suspicion of the rightfulness of his ownership—holding the patent of the Government since 1849—it is believed that no claim more just could be presented for the intervention of Congress.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM CONWAY.

A bill (H. R. No. 100) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. KELSEY.]

FRANCIS WLODECKI.

A bill (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki.

By the bill, Francis Wlodecki, of Lake county, Illinois, is authorized to locate one hundred and twenty acres of the public lands of the United States, to be selected from any of the public lands subject to private entry, at the rate of $1 25 per acre; and upon return being made to the General Land Office of such location, the President is directed to issue a patent therefor to Francis Wlodecki, provided that the same shall be in full discharge for all claims which Wlodecki has on the Government, arising under the act of Congress, approved June 30, 1854, entitled "An act granting land to certain exiles from Poland."

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

REGIS LOISEL.

A bill (H. R. No. 214) for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives. [Objected to by Mr. UNDERWOOD.]

CHARLES D. MAXWELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Doctor Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy.

The bill requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and pay to Doctor Charles D. Maxwell, surgeon in the Navy of the United States, the difference of pay between that of the grade of a passed assistant surgeon and a surgeon, from the 22d of December, 1845, to the 7th of July, 1848, being the period during which he performed the duties of surgeon and assistant surgeon on board the United States ship Cyane, and that the same be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report states that on the 22d of December, 1845, Charles D. Maxwell, a passed assistant surgeon, United States Navy, on board the United States ship Legaré, Captain William Mervine commanding, was required to perform not only his own duties, but those also of surgeon of the ship, in consequence of the detachment from the ship of the surgeon. And the certificates of Captain Mervine and Commander Dupont, both in command of the ship at different times during the period of his extra service, show that he performed all the medical duties of the ship from the 22d of December, 1845, to the 7th July, 1848; and one of them certifies that these duties were of the most arduous character. The committee are satisfied that the petitioner did perform the duties of his own grade, and also those of the grade above him, or double duty, and that, though his labors and responsibilities were thereby greatly increased, under existing laws he is restricted to the compensation of the subordinate grade. Under similar circumstances, but with inferior claims to increased compensation, Congress, on the 1st of August, 1854, passed "An act for the relief of Dr. S. R. Addison, passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy." The committee, therefore, think the petitioner equitably entitled to the difference between the pay of a passed assistant surgeon, which he has already received, and the pay of a surgeon; and they report a bill accordingly.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

CAPTORS OF THE BRITISH BRIG CALEDONIA.

A bill (H. R. No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $25,000 to the captors of the British brig Caledonia, on the 8th of October, 1812, on the Niagara river, near Fort Erie, or to their legal representatives. The payment to be made to the legal representatives of the late Captain Jesse D. Elliott, to the legal representatives of the late General Nathan Towson, then a captain of artillery, and to the officers and men engaged in the capture aforesaid, or their legal representatives, in such proportions as each may be found to be entitled to, according to the usages of the naval service.

The report states that it appears from the official account of Lieutenant Jesse D. Elliott, dated October 9, 1812, and other documents, that being in command of the public armed vessels at Black Rock, he conceived the idea of capturing two British brigs, the Detroit and Caledonia, which had just come down Lake Erie and anchored, the first about two miles above the fort, on the British side of the river, and the latter immediately under the guns of the fort. That being short of force, Lieutenant Elliott applied to General Smyth for volunteers from the Army. The artillery companies of Captains Towson and Barker were allowed to furnish part of the quota, whilst another portion was taken from the infantry. These artillery companies belonged to Colonel Scott's command. Captains Towson and Barker being of equal rank, the command was decided by lot, and the privilege was assigned to Captain Towson. About thirty of the artillery were thus assigned to Captain Towson.

Two boats went off during the night of the 8th of October, 1812, on the expedition thus planned by Lieutenant Elliott—the lieutenant himself commanding one, (with the infantry on board,) and the other being in charge of Sailing-master Watts, with Captain Towson in charge of the artilleryists. After getting near the Caledonia, some hesitation was expressed by the sailing-master as to the possibility of reaching the brig, whereupon Captain Towson at once assumed the command of the boat, and ordered the men to pull alongside. In a few minutes, after a severe conflict, in which one of his men was killed and eight others wounded, (one of them mortally,) Captain Towson succeeded in boarding and capturing the Caledonia, with her valuable cargo, valued by Lieutenant Elliott in his official dispatch at $200,000. Soon after this the Detroit surrendered to Captain Elliott. The Detroit was afterwards burned by order of Lieutenant Elliott, to save her from falling into the hands of the enemy; and a similar order was given by him in regard to the Caledonia; but Captain Towson, not perceiving the necessity for this, took the responsibility of saving the latter, with her rich cargo, and she afterwards formed a part of Commodore Perry's fleet on Lake Erie, and rendered good service, under Lieutenant Turner, in the brilliant action of the 10th September, 1813. David R. Whitely, one of the artillerymen, whose opportunities of knowing all the circumstances seem to have been good, states that he is confident the success of the enterprise, so far as the Caledonia was concerned, was owing to the energy and unflinching courage of Captain Towson, who had the faculty of inspiring all his men with his own resolution and spirit.

On referring to the legislation of Congress on this subject, it does not appear that any allowance has ever been made for the Caledonia or her cargo. On July 13, 1813, Congress included in "An act to reward the officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Hornet, &c., a provision "to Lieutenant Elliott, his officers, and companions, &c., the sum of $12,000 for the capture and destruction of the British brig Detroit." It appears, by a certificate from the Fourth Auditor, that of the prize money awarded by the act of July 13, 1813, Captain Towson received $400 as his distributive share, but that the Caledonia was not included, although the pay-roll was headed for both vessels. The act only appropriated $12,000 for the capture and destruction of the British brig Detroit, and no provision has ever been made for the capture of the Caledonia.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM HEINE.

A bill (H. R. No. 219) for the relief of William Heine, artist in the Japan expedition.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

ELIPHALET BROWN, JR.

A bill (H. R. No. 220) for the relief of Eliphalet Brown, jr.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

MARY BAINBRIDGE.

A bill (H. R. No. 221) for the relief of Mary Bainbridge.

The bill and report were read. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

ELIZABETH E. V. FIELD.

A bill (H. R. No. 222) for the relief of Elizabeth E. V. Field. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.] Mr. HUGHES moved that the committee rise. The motion was not agreed to.

KATHARINE K. RUSSELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 223) for the relief of Katharine K. Russell. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.] Mr. HUGHES. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and HAWKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 84.

So the committee refused to rise.

STEPHEN BUNNELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 224) for the relief of Stephen Bunnell. [Objected to by Mr. MAYNARD.]

CHARLOTTE BUTLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 226) for the relief of Charlotte Butler. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

JOHN RICHMOND.

A bill (H. R. No. 225) to increase the pension of John Richmond.

The bill raises the two-thirds pension of John Richmond, a private in the war of 1812, to a full pension, to commence 1st of January, 1855, and to continue during his natural life.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DEWART moved that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CHAFFEE and MILLSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-six, noes not counted.

So the committee refused to rise.

JOSEPH M. PLUMMER AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 227) for the relief of Joseph M. Plummer and Mary R. Plummer, minor children of Captain Samuel M. Plummer.

Mr. RITCHIE. There is a report in this case, and a long one. If the committee will allow me, I will state the facts in half the time it would take to read it. This bill proposes to give these children a pension, under the usual practice of the Government by which pensions are allowed to the minor children of persons who have died of wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States. This bill, in conformity with uniform precedent, merely fixes the pensions until the children arrive at the age of sixteen years.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The uniform practice of the Government, as I understand the general law, is, that where a soldier or an officer has been killed in battle, or died in the service, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted in the service, leaving a widow and minor children, they receive a half-pay pension for five years, provided that the pension shall not continue to the children beyond the age of sixteen years.

Mr. RITCHIE. Precisely this case.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. By the act of February 3, 1853, you continue the pension of that class five years longer.

Mr. RITCHIE. Well, this provides a pension up to sixteen years of age, and stops there.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are thousands of others in the same condition. If you relieve one, there should be a general law for all.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that we put a section in this bill extending this provision so as to make it general.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The committee had better prepare a bill for that purpose.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It may be done in a very few moments.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the bill.

HENRY TAYLOR.

A bill (H. R. No. 228) for the relief of Henry Taylor.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to inquire of the gentleman who reported that bill why he cannot obtain relief at the Pension Office.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know exactly.

Mr. LETCHER. Was there ever application made there?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. What was the report made at the Pension Office?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have not seen the report.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I think we had better inquire into this case a little. I object to the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report to the House a recommendation that the House concur in the following adverse reports: an adverse report (C. C. No. 111) upon the petition of Arnold Harris, administrator of Robert Armstrong; an adverse report (C. C. No. 145) upon the petition of Nathaniel Williams; also, that the following adverse report be referred to the Committee of Claims: an adverse report (C. C. No. 126) on the petition of James Thompson, surviving partner of C. M. Strader & Co.; also, that the House had directed him to report back the following bills, with the recommendation that they do pass:

A bill (H. R. No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton;

A bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of Thomas Smithers;

A bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of the heirs of Alexander Stevenson;

A bill (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of the legal representatives or assignees of James Lawrence;

A bill (H. R. No. 212) for the relief of N. C. Weems, of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 213) for the relief of Francis Wlodecki;

A bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Doctor Charles Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia in the war of 1812; and

A bill (H. R. No. 225) to increase the pension of John Richmond.

JOHN HAMILTON.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the report of the committee be agreed to en masse, after I have moved an amendment to House bill No. 8, for the relief of John Hamilton. I propose to add to the bill after the word dollars, "with interest from the first day of June, 1852." The bill appropriates $200 to an old soldier, and the amendment proposes that he shall receive interest on that sum from the time he perfected and presented his proof to Congress, which was on the day I have named. The bill has twice passed the House, and each time only failed of becoming a law by want of time. The simple question is, whether the House will allow this poor old soldier interest since he perfected his proof and presented it to Congress? The Committee on Military Affairs declined to recommend that the interest should be allowed. I call for the previous question on the amendment, and on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HICKMAN moved that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division of the House—ayes 108, nays 36.

Mr. HICKMAN moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

JOHN HAMILTON AGAIN.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand the gentleman to say that the failure in this case was in Congress to act upon the bill.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, sir; the old soldier only asks for interest from the day he perfected his proof. The interest will not amount to more than fifty dollars.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is it usual to allow interest?

Mr. STANTON. It has been done more than a hundred times.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. How does this bill take precedence of the others?

The SPEAKER. Bills are taken up before reports. If the gentleman insists on the point the Chair will begin with the Court of Claims reports.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do insist upon it.

ARNOLD HARRIS.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 111) upon the petition of Arnold Harris, administrator of Robert Armstrong.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a concurrence in the report of the Court of Claims rejecting the claim.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House was concurred in.

JAMES THOMPSON.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 126) on the petition of James Thompson, surviving partner of C. M. Strader & Co.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend that this report be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House was concurred in.

NATHANIEL WILLIAMS.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 145) upon the petition of Nathaniel Williams.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend a concurrence in the report of the Court of Claims rejecting the claim.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House was concurred in.

JOHN HAMILTON.

The next bill taken up was House bill (No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton, reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STANTON moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word "dollars" the words "with interest after 1st June, 1852;" and demanded the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FLORENCE and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, nays 28.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put, being first upon Mr. STANTON'S amendment.

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON. In order to save time, I will withdraw the amendment.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut. I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, (at eighteen minutes after three o'clock, p. m.,) moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 51, nays 89.

The question recurred on Mr. STANTON'S amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. Was not the amendment withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Objection was made to its withdrawal by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLARK.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There has been no vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That was not a decision on the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman cannot withdraw the amendment after the previous question has been ordered; it has passed from under his control.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The previous question was ordered upon the engrossment of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It brings the House, as the gentleman is aware, first to vote upon the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Exactly; the rule is express that a gentleman can withdraw a proposition at any time before it is acted on.

The SPEAKER. The amendment may have been the very reason why the House seconded the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not the practice of the present organization of the House, and has it not been all the while the practice, if a motion be pending for the commitment, or recommendation, or reference of a bill, that the person making that motion has a right, after the seconding of the previous question, to withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. Never, in a single instance, that the Chair recollects.

Mr. HOUSTON. My recollection is, that it has been done within the last two or three days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad if the gentleman from Alabama would point to the page on the Journal where it may be found.

Mr. STANTON. If there be any difficulty about the question of order, I will not withdraw the amendment.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 84, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Hughes, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Humphrey Marshall, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Pike, Purviance, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Ward, and Israel Washburn—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Bliss, Boocock, Bonham, Bryan, Burnett, Case, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Burton Craigie, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Fenton, Florence, Gartrell, Giddings, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Harlan, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Lamar, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Montgomery, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Scales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Stallworth, Stevenson, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Waldron, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman voted with the minority.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will my colleague allow me the floor for a few minutes? This is a principle which overthrows the former practice of the Government.

Mr. STANTON. If my colleague will permit me, I can show him several hundred instances of where interest has been paid.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to debate.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

Monday, March 8, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. Jabez Fox.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair) laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by one hundred copies of the Navy Register for the current year for the use of the Senate; which was read.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

He also laid before the Senate, reports of the Court of Claims, made in pursuance of law, adverse to the claim of Charles D. Arfwedson; the claim of Nathaniel and Benjamin Goddard, executors of Nathaniel Goddard; the claim of Samuel D. Cozzens, trustee of Mary S. Cozzens, wife of Benjamin Cozzens; and the claim of Jacob Bigelow, administrator of Francois Carzeau; and a report of the Court of Claims in favor of the claim of Peter Parker, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Peter Parker; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for the establishment of a mail route between Lawrence, in Kansas Territory and Nebraska City, in Nebraska Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Richard W. Clarke, praying for additional compensation for services rendered while a messenger in the Pension Office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KENNEDY presented a memorial of the association of the defenders of Baltimore in 1814, praying that pensions may be granted to the officers and soldiers of the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, in relation to the erection of a building at Trenton, for the accommodation of the United States courts and the offices of the collector and postmaster in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a petition of citizens of Trenton, New Jersey, praying for the enactment of a law to change the name of the port of Lamberton to that of Trenton; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GREEN presented a petition of Thomas D. W. Yonley and others, citizens of Missouri, praying to be protected in their location of certain lands in the Plattsburg land district, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the erection of a marine hospital, custom-house, and post office, at Muscatine, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the memorial of E. D. Hills and others, praying the erection of a light-house at the mouth of Kewanee river, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BIGLER presented a petition of James Foster, James Craig, and others, for the establishment of a mail route from Oregon, Missouri, to White Cloud, in Kansas; from White Cloud to Marysville; from Fort des Moines, Iowa, to Fort Riley; and from White Cloud to Iowa Point; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STUART presented the petition of Caleb Sherman, praying to be released from liability for public money received by him as collector of the customs for the district of Paso del Norte, Texas, which was stolen while in his custody; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of James Bawden, praying that a patent may issue to him for certain lands embraced in the light-house reservation of Eagle harbor, Lake Superior, upon which he has made valuable improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMLIN presented additional papers in support of the claim of the Bangor City Greys to bounty land; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of Polard Webb, offering to sell to the United States a place in the District of Columbia known as "Meridian Hill," for a summer residence for the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented the petition of William R. Brownlee, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of a committee of the levy court of Washington county, for the passage of a law to simplify the mode of conveyancing in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the memorial of a committee of the levy court for the county of Washington, District of Columbia, for an appropriation for certain roads in that county upon certain conditions; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial of underwriters of Boston, remonstrating against the repeal of the law creating the light-house board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, presented a petition of citizens of Arkansas, for the establishment of a mail route from Little Rock to Hungary post office in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of Edward Ingersoll, paymaster and military storekeeper at the Springfield Armory, for the reimbursement of money paid for hack hire for the Army commission of 1853; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BRODERICK presented the memorial of William Cruickshank and others, praying for permission to prosecute their claim to a certain tract of land in California, before the United States district court for the northern district of California; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOSTER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress, to vote against the admission of another slaveholding State into the Union; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I present the memorial of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, praying for an act to confirm their title to a small piece of land in the Mississippi river, opposite the lands which they own at Prairie du Chien. It is accompanied by a map setting out the line of their railroad. I beg leave to state that the railroad company have built a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river, without any aid whatever from the General Government. They own the title to the lands adjoining the river, and they claim to own this piece of land which is in the river, and is subject to overflow; but some question has been raised about it, and as it can really be of no service to any other person or company, it is desirable that it should be confirmed in them. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I have received a memorial, very numerous signed by citizens of New York, stating that the great disasters in trade and commerce throughout the country for the last year have rendered necessary some legislation which will enable creditors and debtors to meet and adjust their difficulties, and they apprehend that a considerable period of time must elapse before business shall be restored. The memorial does not state that the memorialists ask for a bankrupt law; they ask for a relief law; but I take it it must be in the nature of a bankrupt law. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Alfred G. Benson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

RECOMMITTAL OF A REPORT.

Mr. STUART. The memorial of the Bangor City Greys was referred to the Committee on Public Lands at this session, and reported back adversely. It has since been ascertained that certain evidence, which they desired to have considered in connection with their memorial, and which was not then received, has now been received. I move, therefore, to recommit the memorial, in order that the evidence may go with it, and the case be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the Senate, the usual number of copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of February 26, 1858, with the accompanying report of J. Ross Browne, special agent of that Department, on the Pacific coast; and the letter of the Secretary of the Navy of January 4, 1858, with the report of offers for supplies for bureau of docks and yards.

Mr. KENNEDY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the eligibility of Weverton, in Maryland, as a site for a national foundry.

Mr. KENNEDY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That medical officers and pursers of the Navy shall be, in relation to rank, on the same footing as officers of similar grades in the Army; provided, that no medical officer or purser shall exercise command over any navy-yard or vessel of the United States.

Mr. GREEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the correspondence, reports, and other papers on file in his office or the General Land Office, having relation to the cancellation of the locations which were made at the Plattsburg (Missouri) land office, in the month of March, 1857, by Thomas D. W. Yonley and others, and the subsequent location of the same land by Messrs. McClaughlin and Felix, of Pennsylvania; adding thereto the letter or report of the register and receiver, of the 3d of March, 1857, in the contested case of Hardin and Jackson, and the Commissioner's ruling and concurrence therein on the 21st of April thereafter; together with any other letter or paper which the Secretary may deem material to the proper understanding of the relative rights of the parties herein firstly alluded to.

Mr. CLAY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate any papers on file in the War Department connected with the military topographical memoir and report of Captain T. J. Cram, called for by the resolution of the Senate of the 15th of February.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to consider the expediency of amending the laws for the punishment of persons enticing or carrying away any soldiers of the Army of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to request the Court of Claims to return to the Senate the papers of A. Weeks.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom were referred the papers relating to the claim of B. E. Edwards, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 186) to confirm the title of Benjamin E. Edwards to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution directing the printing of twenty thousand copies of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 58) to authorize and direct the settlement of the accounts of Ross Wilkins, James Witherell, and Solomon Sibley, reported it without amendment.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of A. W. Macpherson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 187) for the relief of A. W. Macpherson. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 176) to acquire certain lands needed for the Washington aqueduct, in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

HEIRS OF DAVID A. RING.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Anna M. E. Ring and others, has instructed me to report in favor of the petitioners, accompanied by a bill, and to ask for its immediate passage. I will say in support of this motion a single word. These petitioners are the only daughters of a gentleman to whom a land warrant was issued for services in the war of 1812. Finding himself at the point of death, he executed an assignment in favor of his daughters. That assignment, under the general law, is null and void, because it was executed before the land warrant had actually been issued, and the bill is for the purpose of obviating that difficulty. These are the four daughters of the soldier to whom the warrant was issued, and in whose favor it was issued, dated after his death.

The bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of Anna M. E. Ring, Louisa M. Ring, Cordelia E. Ring, and Sarah J. Launoy, was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to vest in them all the right, title, and interest of David A. Ring to a land warrant, No. 3,172, for one hundred and sixty acres of land, issued on the 18th of July, 1855.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution in regard to the Patent Office report. It is important that this matter should be disposed of at once, if the printing is to be done at all. We all know that it will be printed and distributed. The committee have considered the subject until they are perfectly satisfied of the character of the report they should make, and have instructed me, instead of providing for twenty-seven thousand extra copies which have hitherto been voted by this body to be distributed by the members of the Senate, being divided amongst them per capita, to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, in addition to the usual number, ten thousand copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents on arts and manufactures for the year 1857; eight thousand of which shall be for the use of the Senate, and two thousand for the Interior Department, for the purposes of official distribution.

I ask for the consideration of the resolution at once. The facts in regard to it I will state in a few words.

Mr. STUART. I should be very glad to hear the Senator's statement; but I shall object to the passage of the resolution to-day, while so many gentlemen are absent from the Senate. I shall be glad to hear the statement, and then let the subject go over until some time when the Senate shall be full.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Of course I shall not object to that. I would very much prefer that the Senate should be full when this subject is acted upon. I believe, however, it would be well to put this statement at once before the body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution to-day. Does the Senator from Michigan object?

Mr. STUART. I do not object to its consideration, with the understanding that it shall go over. I shall be glad to hear the statement.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing on this point may as well be given now and appear in print. I will send it up to the desk and ask that it be read. I desire every Senator, of course, to have an opportunity of understanding the question.

The Secretary read the following report from the Superintendent of Public Printing:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING, WASHINGTON, January 21, 1858.

Sir: The Mechanical Patent Office report for 1857 (the copy of which is herewith returned) will somewhat exceed in size that of the preceding year. It is estimated that this report will make two volumes of letter-press of 672 pages each, and one volume of illustrations of 690 pages. The estimated cost of printing and binding is as follows:

Cost of the usual number (1,420 copies) of volume one, $1,705 95.

Cost per thousand, for extra copies, (in addition,) $607 02.

The cost of the second volume will be about the same.

Cost of the usual number (1,420 copies) of volume three, $7,994 69.

Cost per thousand, for extra copies, (in addition,) $719 95.

Or, if the same number of copies are ordered as last year, (27,000, in addition to the usual number,) the aggregate cost for the complete work will be about $59,000.

Very respectfully, GEORGE W. BOWMAN, Superintendent.

Hon. R. W. JOHNSON, Chairman Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. This portion of the work, the report on arts and manufactures, or, as it is called, the mechanical portion, has reached three volumes. Originally it was but one volume. It has gone on, gradually increasing every year, and this year it has gone beyond all former years. I had an idea of a serious attempt, during the last Administration, to extend it to a series of quarto volumes: whenever it shall have reached that, the expense will be greatly beyond what it is at the present time. Even as it is now, the expense is much more than was ever contemplated at the inception of this system. These three volumes are made up of what formerly constituted but one volume. The cost of the usual number, which is fourteen hundred and twenty copies, of volume one, is $1,705 95. The cost of the usual number of volume two, is $1,705 95, the same amount. The cost of the usual number of volume three, which is a volume entirely filled with plates and drawings of the various inventions which are to be found in that office—a vast number of which are of no use on the face of the earth, and never will be, and are not worth putting into the book, and are a source of confusion and difficulty to him who may be a searcher after the truths to be found in it—will be $7,994 69.

One thing which I do not like is observable in these estimates; somehow or other they seem always to fall a few dollars short of a hundred, or a few dollars short of a thousand. I have no question on earth but that the cost of volume three will be over eight thousand dollars, and I do not know but that it will be $9,000. The addition of $5 31 would certainly make it $8,000 for the printing of that single volume. The whole cost, then, of the printing of the usual number, which originally would not have been more than seven hundred or two thousand dollars, is now $11,406 59. You can then multiply the copies as much as you please, up to a million. The cost of the extra copies, per thousand, is $1,934; the cost of ten thousand extra copies, which is the number the committee at present instruct me to report, counting the cost at $2,000, is $20,000. The cost of twenty-seven thousand extra copies would, therefore, necessarily be $54,000. The committee have instructed me to report in favor of printing ten thousand copies only.

The cost per volume of the work is over seventy cents a copy. If you throw out of consideration the cost of the original fourteen hundred and twenty, and only consider what it costs to multiply the extra copies after the first numbers are printed, it would be sixty-six and two thirds cents for each volume; but adding the cost of the usual number, it must necessarily go beyond seventy cents, and the fewer the number printed the greater is the cost of each volume. Ten thousand extra copies will give to each Senator about one hundred and sixty copies for distribution. The twenty-seven thousand extra copies which have hitherto been ordered, gave to each Senator about four hundred and thirty-five copies. Almost every committee-room is filled up with these documents for the greater part of the session, and some of them lie over until the next session after that at which they are printed. I know there is not a single committee on which I serve in whose room there are not large numbers of volumes of Patent Office reports of former years, not distributed. A great many Senators, I believe, abandon them altogether; and where they go, or how they go, I do not know; but they are to be found in great quantities throughout the city. I will advertise to Senators and others who may wish to buy them, that I have seen certificates showing that they have been purchased by the hundred at fifteen cents apiece; and they cost us upwards of seventy cents. Something is wrong in this matter, it is evident. The Government pays for publishing at this rate over seventy cents; and yet if you go into the city at proper places you certainly can purchase them at fifteen cents a copy. I have seen the certificates and receipts for it.

* The eight thousand copies, which is the real number which the committee propose to be distributed by Senators, gives one hundred and twenty-nine copies to each Senator to be distributed amongst his constituents, and a few over. The resolution also gives to the Interior Department two thousand copies for official distribution in such quarters as it may be deemed beneficial to the public that these reports should be sent.

This is a succinct statement of the facts in regard to the matter. I will now assent to the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, that the subject shall lie over until the Senate shall be more full than it seems to be at present.

Mr. WILSON. Before the subject passes over, I wish to submit an amendment to the resolution proposed by the Committee on Printing:

And that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents on mechanics, hereafter to be made to Congress, to be prepared and submitted in such manner as that the plates and drawings necessary to illustrate each subject shall be inserted in their proper places in the text, so as to comprise the entire report in one volume.

The further consideration of the resolution was postponed until to-morrow.

COURTS IN VERMONT.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (S. No. 111) to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont, without amendment; and as it is one of those bills which never encounter opposition, I desire that it may be passed at once.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill. It directs that the circuit court of the United States, now held at Windsor, on the 21st of May, shall, after the 1st of July next, be held on the first Tuesday of July annually at that place; and that the district court of the United States for Vermont, instead of being held on the 27th of May, shall, after the first of July next, be held on the Monday next after the fourth Tuesday of July annually. All indictments, information, suits, or action and proceedings of any kind, whether civil or criminal, now pending in those courts are to be heard, tried, and determined on these days, in the same manner as if the courts were held on the 21st and 27th days of May respectively.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY PETERY.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, the bill (S. No. 173) for the relief of Mary Petery was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the proper accounting officers to pay to Mary Petery, widow of Peter Petery, seventy-five dollars, in full compensation for a horse, lost while in the military service of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senate will pass this bill at once through all its forms. It is a meritorious case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTINE BARNARD.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask the Senate to take up the bill, which is on its third reading, for the relief of Christine Barnard. It proposes to renew a pension which has been heretofore granted.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 91) to continue a pension to Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, United States Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BRIGHT.) The question is, shall the bill pass?

Mr. CLAY. Is it too late to move an amendment to the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir; it has had its third reading.

Mr. CLAY. I had proposed to move to amend the bill by striking out the amount proposed to be paid as a pension, and reducing it to the maximum which is allowed in such cases; but if it is too late to make the motion, I shall simply content myself with voting against the bill.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 307) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed.

A bill (H. R. No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled joint resolution (S. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" in respect to dropped and retired naval officers; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 307) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ELIZABETH MONTGOMERY.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 30) for the relief of Elizabeth Montgomery, heir of Hugh Montgomery.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elizabeth Montgomery, daughter and sole heir of Captain Hugh Montgomery, of the ship Nancy, of Wilmington, Delaware, $5,000, as a full compensation for his successful efforts in saving the powder and munitions of war belonging to the United States on board that ship, and for his interest in the value of the ship, which he blew up to prevent her and her cargo from falling into the hands of the enemy during the war of the Revolution.

The bill was reported back from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with an amendment to insert:

And that the said sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. KING. Is there any report in this case, or any information about it?

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to hear the report read.

The Secretary read the report, from which it appears that Captain Hugh Montgomery, formerly of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, was employed as captain of the brig Nancy, of that port, belonging to himself and others. In the latter part of the year 1775, the brig, chartered by Robert Morris, then a member of Congress, was dispatched to the West Indies with a cargo of flour to be sold, and the proceeds returned to the United States in gunpowder and munitions of war. The cargo was sold at Porto Rico, and the Nancy then proceeded to St. Croix, where she was privately loaded with her return cargo, consisting of four hundred and sixty barrels of gunpowder, six long four-pounders, four chests of small-arms and other munitions of war, and with sundry articles of merchandise, belonging to Montgomery. After the reception of his cargo, by means of the cannon and some swivels, and other arms, Captain Montgomery converted his ship into a vessel-of-war, and sailed for the Delaware, in order that he might deliver his cargo at Philadelphia, according to his directions. When he approached the Delaware capes he was intercepted by two British ships-of-war. He succeeded in beating off the boats sent to capture him; but finding it impossible to escape capture, he ran his ship into shoal water, and commenced removing the powder and munitions of war to the shore, and securing them from capture, leaving the private property to its fate. He kept off the enemy's boats whilst he landed two hundred and forty-four barrels of the powder, the cannon, small-arms, and other munitions of war, with the aid of Captain Weeks, who commanded some American vessels-of-war within the capes. When he had so far succeeded in saving the cargo, one of the enemy's vessels approached within three hundred yards, cast anchor, and opened a destructive fire, whilst several boats filled with men approached for the purpose of boarding the Nancy. Finding it impossible to save more of the powder and private property, he left the vessel, having laid a train and match communicating with the powder, preferring to destroy both his vessel and the rest of her cargo rather than it should fall into the hands of the enemy. The boats' crews had scarcely taken possession of the vessel, when she was blown up with all on board, and, with the remains of her cargo, was destroyed. That part of the cargo which had been saved was transported to Philadelphia, and safely delivered to the agents of the Government. Subsequently, Captain Montgomery went to sea in a private armed ship, was captured by a British cruiser, imprisoned for a long time, and treated with great harshness, on account of the destruction of so many British sailors, by blowing up his vessel, as before stated. During his long imprisonment his mind became disordered, and during his voyage homeward, after his release, he leaped overboard in a fit of insanity, and was drowned, leaving a widow, who has been long dead, and the petitioner, his only child, then a small girl.

The petitioner prays that Congress will make her some compensation for the losses of her father, sustained in the destruction of his vessel, and for his patriotic conduct in saving the public property, then so much needed, to the neglect of his own, which he might have saved, instead of that which belonged to the public. A claim is set up for the value of this private property, shipped on board the Nancy on his own account. But of this no satisfactory evidence has been given, and the committee have been unable to form any estimate of its value. As to the other part of the claim, the main facts are fully proved by an affidavit of Captain Mendenhall, who was one of the crew of the Nancy, and cognizant of all the facts of the voyage, and the safe landing of the greater part of the munitions of war. The blowing up of the vessel and the saving of the gunpowder are stated in an original letter, filed with the evidence, from George Read, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, to his wife, dated the 6th of July, 1776, a few days after the occurrence. And, on the whole, the committee are of opinion that the facts before set forth are satisfactorily proved. If, as is alleged, the vessel was chartered for the purpose set forth, it is presumed no doubt could exist that the Government ought to pay; the destruction being beneficial to it, and inevitable under the circumstances, to prevent the vessel and her cargo from falling into the hands of the enemy. Many claims of this kind have been paid.

The great difficulty in allowing this claim is its antiquity; but in this case the delay is satisfactorily accounted for. On a review of the whole case, the committee have come to the conclusion that the petitioner ought to be liberally remunerated to the extent of any loss sustained in the destruction of the vessel by her father. But, after the length of such a time, no evidence could be furnished of the value of the vessel. Any estimate would be conjectural; but as the claim is a just one, they have come to the conclusion to give her $5,000, as a full and final satisfaction of her claim.

Mr. GREEN. The hour for the consideration of the special order has almost arrived. The Kansas question is occupying our time; and I have been instructed to notify the country and the Senate that on next Monday the friends of the bill will insist on coming to a direct vote, so that the intervening time had best not be wasted on any other subject. It has been discussed, to a greater or less extent, for three months; and, with two weeks direct discussion, we believe it can be fully investigated, so as to be ready for a vote full and fair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour for the consideration of the special order, which is the bill for the admission of the State of Kansas, has arrived.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the announcement just made by the Senator from Missouri, who is in charge of the bill reported from the Committee on Territories, that the majority of this body have determined upon Monday, one week from to-day, as the day upon which the final vote is to be taken, I confess, places me in a state of embarrassment. I look around me, upon this floor, and I see many men more able than myself to do justice to the question now before the Senate. I see many of them, almost all of them, more experienced than I am; and this announcement, I confess, as it comes home to my heart, raises within me a struggle which I had hoped not to have experienced. It is a struggle whether, in consequence of this announcement, I must restrict the utterance of all I would desire to say, or be compelled to trespass upon the time of others, who could do more justice to the question than is within my power. Mr. President, it is a subject which weighs me down; it is a subject upon which I feel most deeply; a subject upon which I can hardly find language to give utterance to all the emotions that rise within me; and yet, in duty to myself, in duty to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, in duty to the great mass of the free white laboring men of the North, I feel called upon to speak, to open my heart, on this floor, and on this question, and not to refrain from the utterance of my sentiments as they may arise.

Mr. President, before coming to the discussion of the direct question pending, I must be permitted to notice, in brief terms, some of the extraordinary doctrines announced by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] who preceded me in the debate. Conscious of the strength of our own positions; conscious of the devoted patriotism which we bear towards the Constitution and the Union ourselves, we shall be drawn into no recriminations against the people or the institutions of South Carolina; although the honorable Senator was pleased, in the course of his remarks, to say, in speaking to the representatives and people of the northern States: "We cannot rely upon your faith when you have the power; it has always been broken whenever pledged." Does the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in serious earnest, intend to charge upon the great body of the people of the northern States all that this language implies? If he does, it is impossible for me to remain silent without giving him a passing answer. I ask the honorable gentleman when, and where, and on what occasion, have the people of the North broken their pledged faith, when given to the people of the South, or any other portion of the people of this Confederacy? Was it in the passage of the ordinance of 1787? Who passed that ordinance? It was passed by the unanimous vote of Congress. Every vote from South Carolina was in its favor; every vote from every State within the Confederacy was in its favor, with the exception of a single vote, and that was cast by a gentleman from New York. Who, let me ask you, has ever sought to violate the pledged faith given by the ordinance of 1787? Has it been the people of the North or the representatives of the North?

Again, sir, who was it that passed the Missouri compromise? It was passed by the votes of the representatives of the southern States, against the votes of a majority of the representatives of the northern States. Who sought to break down the pledged faith which was given by the Missouri compromise? Was it the people of the North or the representatives of the North? Was it not the representatives of the southern States, with very few exceptions? But few of the representatives from the States of the North could be found who were ready to break down that, as one of the compromises of this Confederacy.

But again, how inconsistent is the charge made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, when he claims, in the same breath, that for sixty years the slaveholders of the South have controlled the policy of the Government of the United States. Holding the Government in their power, controlling its administration, what right have they to complain of violated pledges and violated faith? They have made the pledges and they have broken them at their pleasure, having the power of the Government in their hands.

Mr. President, this wholesale and sweeping denunciation upon the good faith of the people residing in the northern States, and their representatives in Congress, is a denunciation which calls upon me, for one, to repel it. The truth of history, in my humble judgment, not only does not sustain the charge, but it furnishes not the slightest foundation upon which it can rest.

But the Senator from South Carolina makes some more specific charges, he asks some more direct questions, and says, when we, the representatives of the North shall take possession of the administration of the Government what guarantee have the South that "you will not plunder us with tariffs?" This, too, comes from South Carolina, which for years has studied in the school of its great master, a man of great intellect, of great purity of personal character, John C. Calhoun, the representative man of South Carolina, and the very man who was foremost among the advocates of the tariff policy, of which the gentleman now complains. I hold in my hand a volume which records the fact that Mr. Calhoun not only made an earnest and eloquent speech but gave his vote to establish, for the first time in the history of this Government, a tariff whose avowed object was the protection of the manufactures of this country. I quote an extract from the speech of Mr. Calhoun on the occasion of the passage of the tariff bill of 1816:

"When our manufactures are grown to a certain perfection, as they soon will, under the fostering care of Government, we will no longer experience these evils."—Benton's Abridgment of Debates, vol. 5, p. 641.

In April, 1816, it came to a final vote, and among others, Mr. Calhoun is found voting in the affirmative:

"And thus," says Mr. Benton, "was inaugurated a new policy with respect to the imposition of duties on imports." * * * "Protection became the object, and revenue the incident, and to such a degree as often to disregard revenue altogether, and a surplus of nine millions was actually created."

I do not stand here as the advocate of a high tariff; I do not stand here as the advocate of any protective tariff, except so far as a tariff for revenue may give incidental protection to the manufacturing interests of the country; but, sir, does it not come with an ill grace from the State of South Carolina to ask us, when we take possession of the Government, whether we will not plunder them with tariffs, when the great representative man of South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, himself, was the early author and advocate of the very tariff policy of which the Senator complains?

Again, the Senator asks the question, what guarantee have the South that we will not create another national bank? This, too, comes from South Carolina! Sir, it was John C. Calhoun who, in 1814, introduced the resolutions of inquiry in relation to the establishment of a national bank, and it was John C. Calhoun, in 1816, who, with others, brought forward and passed the very United States bank bill of which the gentleman complains. I am no advocate of a national bank. I have opposed that institution and its creation in every form within my power for twenty years of my manhood. I oppose it now. The question of a United States bank is no more a question of discussion before the American people, than the question of the revolutionary war, or the question of the last war with Great Britain. The battle has been fought, the victory won, the policy of the Government forever settled on that question, and the Republican party is no more in favor of the establishment of a national bank than the honorable Senator himself. But with what grace does it come from the Senator from South Carolina to raise the question whether, when we take possession of the Government, we may not establish a national bank, when it was the leader from South Carolina who introduced the very bank bill which cost us such a struggle to put down?

What guarantee have they, he asked again, that "we will not bankrupt" them "with internal improvements?" Sir, Mr. Calhoun, in the same speech from which I have already quoted, in 1816, advocated this very doctrine of internal improvement. In language, forcible, and in no way to be mistaken, he said:

"To give perfection to this state of things, it will be necessary to add, as soon as possible, a system of internal improvements."

I stand here as no advocate of a general system of internal improvements by the Government of the United States. I stand here as the advocate of the doctrine laid down by General Jackson in his veto of the Maysville road bill; but, at the same time, I am ready, so far as I am able, to oppose the pretense that the whole expenditures of public money in relation to the protection and regulation of our commerce must be upon the seashore; where the water is salt, and the tide ebbs and flows; and at the same time no money is to be expended upon the great lakes, over which more commerce floats than the whole value of the cotton crop of which the honorable gentleman spoke in such eloquent terms. Against any such distinction, I, for one, am prepared to give my vote, my voice, and my influence.

The honorable Senator, in coolly looking upon the division of this Union into two great confederacies, North and South, and in comparing and in calculating their strength, their greatness, and their resources, dwelt at very great length upon the value of the cotton crop produced in the slaveholding States. I do not stand here to disparage any one of the southern States. I know their greatness, and I take pride in it. I claim the southern States as a part of this glorious Confederacy to which I myself belong. I acknowledge the greatness of the cotton crop produced there as an article of export. I acknowledge the great influence which it exercises throughout the manufacturing and commercial world; but while I acknowledge all that, the gentleman will not regard it unkind in me if I remind him of the fact that the cotton crop, with all its boasted value, is not worth as much as the hay which the farmers of the United States put into their barns.

Again, the honorable Senator said, in comparing the southern with the northern States, that we have our slaves, and that our slaves are white. I will quote his precise language:

"Your whole class of manual laborers and operatives, as you call them, are slaves." * * * "Your slaves are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than an army with bayonets, and could combine, where would you be?"

I do not deny that in the large cities of the North, or in the large cities of the South, or where ever large cities are found on the face of the whole earth, where riches in abundance, and poverty in its degradation, are brought together face to face, and concentrated; where all that attends upon vice, poverty, and crime, is developed to the greatest extent, the children of misfortune, vice, poverty, beggary, and crime, may be found. They may be found in the streets of the city of New York. Are they not also in the streets of Baltimore, in the streets of Charleston, in the streets of New Orleans? The reason why there are more in the city of New York than in any other of the cities of the Union, is because it is the great commercial center of this continent, open to the commerce of the world, receiving the influx of population from every portion of the globe.

If the honorable Senator had confined his remark to those specimens of misfortune which are to be found in the large cities of the North, I should have given it no notice whatever; but he says a majority of our people, a majority of the voters in the northern States, are slaves. This remark compels me to notice it. I could not do otherwise if I would. In behalf of the great State which I now in part represent upon this floor, four fifths of whose population earn their daily bread by their own labor, all of whose population regard labor as dignified and honorable, and not as a degradation, I repel the imputation. I should be false to them if I did not repel it now and here. I should be false to myself, false to my own education, and false to my own parentage, if I failed to do so. Sir, the very blood that courses in these veins rises up to repel any such charge. Am I to be told on the floor of the Senate that, because my own father was a poor laboring man when he commenced the great battle of life, I am to be regarded as the son of a slave? There are others around me who will feel as deeply as I feel, the full import of this declaration, and who cannot suffer it to pass unnoticed.

As one of the representatives of the free white men of the non-slaveholding States, I tell the honorable Senator they are not slaves now, nor will they be made slaves. They understand full well their power and their position and their future destiny upon this continent. They know no masters; they acknowledge no dictators. They kneel to none but God, and not even then unless in their own way.

When I last addressed the Senate, Mr. President, I said all that I desired to say in relation to the often-repeated intimation which we hear upon this floor and elsewhere, that unless Kansas be admitted into the Union at once under the Leecompton constitution, the Union is to be dissolved. Sir, this is but an appeal to our weakness, to our apprehensions; it is not an appeal to our judgment and our understanding. I propose, as briefly as I may, to go into an examination of the merits of the question now pending before the Senate. In the first place, and admitting for the present the legality and authority of the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas which was elected, or claims to have been elected, in the spring of 1855: standing for the present upon the ground assumed by the friends of this measure, the question which I now propose to examine as a legal question is this: whether the Leecompton constitution is of binding authority on the people of Kansas? Has it the force of a law upon that people, binding upon them, and binding also upon the States, and the people of the United States?

This involves some other questions. The first among them is, whether the people of a Territory can, of their own voluntary motion, without any enabling act by Congress, without any act by the Territorial Legislature, independent of all existing legal authorities, form and establish a system of government to overturn an existing Government, and make it legitimate, authoritative, and binding upon the people? As an American citizen, maintaining the doctrines of the American Revolution, I admit that, as an abstract right, any people possesses the right to change the form of their government and make that government conform to their own will; but that is a revolutionary, not a legal right. It is a right which rests not upon the law, but a right which is above and before and beyond the law itself. It rests upon the higher law of the absolute sovereignty of the people, if there is any absolute sovereignty in human affairs. But it is a right to be exercised only as a revolutionary right. When the evils of an existing government become intolerable, and there is no peaceable mode of redress, or when there is a people existing without any government at all, they may exercise, and properly exercise, this abstract revolutionary right to commence and take incipient steps from the beginning to form and to establish the government under which they are to live. There is another qualification to the exercise of this right; and that is, that there should be a moral certainty of success. Whoever undertakes to revolutionize a government, to disturb the existing state of things, to supersede the established government and make it give place to another, must carry the revolution through; he must carry it to victory, to success, or he must pay the penalty for producing a rebellion.

If it be conceded that in the Territory of Kansas any such state of things has existed as to justify the exercise of this revolutionary right by the people themselves, independent of any enabling act by Congress, or any act of the Territorial Legislature—what follows? It follows that the Topeka constitution, established by the people of Kansas, by their own voluntary action, twice submitted to that people, twice ratified by that people by overwhelming majorities, is the true revolutionary constitution for that State, and not the Lecompton constitution. If, therefore, you are to throw yourselves back upon the abstract right of revolution, you prove conclusively, not that Kansas should be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, but that it should be admitted into the Union under the Topeka constitution.

But, sir, I shall not dwell any longer upon that point, for that is not the ground which is assumed by the advocates of the Lecompton constitution. They place themselves upon the ground that the Lecompton constitution is not a revolutionary constitution, but that it is a legally authorized constitution, of binding authority itself; that it has the force of a law binding upon the people of Kansas. Those who advocate it do not choose to inquire whether it has been ratified by the actual majority of the people of Kansas, nor whether it embodies their will. They do not inquire, is it fair? is it just? but, is it authoritative? is it "in the bond?" As a legal question, therefore, the first point which I desire to examine is, upon what do you rest the legal authoritativeness with which you seek to clothe the Lecompton constitution? The President rests it upon the Kansas-Nebraska act, as an enabling act, and upon the act of the Territorial Legislature, passed in pursuance of it, as he alleges, which gave it the authority of law. The honorable Senator from South Carolina [MR. HAMMOND] derives it from altogether a different source. He says "there is no government in the convention until after the adoption by Congress of its constitution." "How can it be possible that the convention should be the creature of a Territorial Legislature?" he asks; and again he says, speaking of the Territorial Legislature:

"Shall that interfere with a sovereignty—inchoate, but still a sovereignty." "The sovereignty of Kansas resides, if it resides anywhere, with the sovereign States of this Union."

He places the sovereignty of the Territories in the States, and says the sovereign powers to be exercised over them while Territories, are to be exercised by Congress, and by Congress alone. The Senator from Tennessee [MR. JOHNSON] traces the authority of this convention, and places its sovereignty not in Congress, not in the United States, not in the Territorial Legislature, but in the people of the Territory of Kansas, independent of the Territorial Legislature, and independent, also, of an enabling act by Congress; while, upon the other hand, the Senator from Georgia, [MR. TOOMBS], derives its authority from another source altogether. You will remember that in the course of his speech, on the 2d of February, I put this question to him, "From what source do you derive the legal authority of the convention to form a constitution at all? From the Legislature of the Territory?" He answered:

"Entirely from the Legislature of the Territory. If the authority came from Congress we should be bound by any propositions we made. If it comes from the Territorial Legislature, we may accept or reject the propositions."

Now, Mr. President, when we come to examine this question as a legal question, does it not strike you that there is some strange conflict of opinion among the friends and advocates of this Lecompton constitution. One placing the source of its authority entirely in Congress as the representative of the sovereign States; another placing it in the people of the Territory independent of Congress, and independent of the Territorial Legislature; and a third deriving its authority entirely from the Legislature of the Territory. Where is this vagrant power? In examining a legal question, the mind desires to be brought right up to the point, to meet it squarely, face to face. Where is it to be found? Where shall we seek the fugitive? Now here, now there, now somewhere else. Now it hides itself in Congress; now in the Territorial Legislature; and then again it is found hiding itself among the people of Kansas, to be exercised by them independent of the Territorial Legislature, and independent of the act of Congress.

I have already said that if it resides in the people, to be exercised as an abstract revolutionary right, the Topeka constitution is the true constitution of Kansas; but I propose to examine a little more particularly the ground which has been assumed by the honorable Senator from Georgia, for that is the ground on which the President places himself, and upon which the advocates of this Lecompton constitution must stand, or not stand at all; and that is upon the authority derived from the Territorial Legislature of Kansas.

The Legislature of a Territory derives its powers from the organic act. The persons who may be elected to the Legislature are chosen by the people of the Territory under the provisions of that organic act, but every power which may be exercised must be found in the organic act, or it cannot be found at all. If it be not within the organic act, it is nowhere; and it therefore necessarily involves the question: whether in the organic act under which the Territory of Kansas was organized, any such power was given by the Congress of the United States? If it be not in the organic act, the action of those gentlemen who happened to sit in the Legislature that called the convention is of no more binding authority than the action of the same number of gentlemen sitting at Topeka or anywhere else in the Territory of Kansas. That which goes beyond the authority given is of no force. It is void; and void things are as no things; and that is the language of all the books in speaking upon this subject.

The same doctrine was expressly affirmed in the case of Arkansas, by the administration of General Jackson. The opinion of the Attorney General was taken, and it became a subject-matter, undoubtedly, of consultation by the Cabinet; and it received the sanction of that illustrious man. The same thing is true in the case of Michigan; and the present Chief Magistrate of the United States, Mr. Buchanan himself, declared on this floor, when Michigan applied for admission, that, if a Territorial Legislature, without an enabling act first passed by Congress, should attempt to call a convention and form a State constitution to supersede the territorial government, it was a downright usurpation—I use his very words—it would be "a downright usurpation on the part of the Territorial Legislature."

Does the Kansas-Nebraska act itself confer any authority upon the Territorial Legislature to call a convention to form a constitution and State government? In what language of that act do you find it? Is it in that language which confers all rightful powers of legislation upon the Territorial Legislature? That is just such language as is found in all the organic acts, commencing with the organization of Mississippi and Orleans; and in the organic act for the Territory of Missouri the same language is used. Is it to be found in those often repeated words:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States?"

Do these words contain it? I shall not go over this ground at length. The argument contained in the speech of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [MR. COLLAMER], and the argument contained in the report of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [MR. DOUGLAS], are perfectly conclusive upon this point, that the Kansas-Nebraska act of itself did not contain a provision authorizing the Legislature of the Territory to call a convention; and the fact that the men who sat in that Legislature called it, gives it no more force than if an equal number of clergymen sitting at Lecompton had done the same thing.

I will briefly state three reasons which have occurred to my mind, and which are equally binding on all sides of this Chamber: First, the Kansas organic act contains no express grant of power to the Legislature to call a convention; second, no such power can be implied from the circumstances under which the act was passed, or from the history or condition of the Territory at the time it was passed, for there were not, I believe, over five hundred white inhabitants in the whole of the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas at the time of the passage of that bill; and, third, if you claim that this language contains an enabling clause, it is utterly void for uncertainty. It mentions no time, prescribes no mode, in which the initiative; the incipient step may be taken towards the formation of a constitution. A portion of the people of that Territory, represented by delegates, assembled at Lecompton, have undertaken to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way; and a certain other portion, and a still larger portion—a majority of three, yes, five to one—of the people of the Territory, represented by their delegates at Topeka, have undertaken to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. Now, which is the legal way? Which is the way pointed out by the statute? There is no legal way pointed out. You cannot see what is not to be seen. There is no such thing contained in it.

I have one other additional reason which I wish to urge upon those who advocate the passage of the bill admitting Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. In these days, when estoppels are being pleaded upon political questions; when it is insisted that, by some technical rule of the law, the people of Kansas are to be estopped by this Lecompton constitution; I desire to plead an estoppel in behalf of that people upon some honorable Senators upon this floor. On the 2d of July, 1856, upon their official oaths as Senators in this body, Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell of Tennessee, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Clay, Crittenden, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Pratt, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Toucey, Weller, Wright, and Yulee, by their votes here, declared that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was not an enabling act; for on that day they voted to create an enabling act for the people of that Territory. If estoppels are to be pleaded against the poor down-trodden people of Kansas, when they have been tyrannized over by a meager minority, backed up by the Army, and the whole force of the Government of the United States, I beg leave, also in their behalf, to plead an estoppel against those gentlemen who are pleading this Lecompton constitution as an estoppel against them. As against the President of the United States, or rather as against this Administration, I will also plead an estoppel. This Administration claims to be estopped by the action of the last Administration from raising any question as to the legality of the Legislature of 1855; that the people of Kansas are to be estopped from saying anything about the usurpation which then took place in that Territory; that they must submit to that Legislature, and to all that follows as the consequence of that submission. The last Administration officially declared, (and the present Administration should be bound by it,) in effect, that there was no enabling act then in existence for Kansas, and that it was necessary that Congress should intervene to pass an enabling act for that Territory. President Pierce said, in a special message to Congress, in January, 1856:

"This, it seems to me, can be best accomplished by providing that when the inhabitants of Kansas may desire it, and shall be of sufficient numbers to constitute a State, a convention of delegates, duly elected by the qualified voters, shall assemble to frame a constitution, and thus prepare, through regular and lawful means, for its admission into the Union as a State. I respectfully recommend the enactment of a law to that effect. I recommend, also, that a special appropriation be made to defray any expense which may become requisite in the execution of the laws or the maintenance of public order in the Territory of Kansas."

It follows of necessity, if there is no enabling act contained in the organic act of Kansas Territory, the whole pretended authoritativeness of this Lecompton convention necessarily comes to the ground, and the constitution of necessity must fall with it. But, sir, I go one step further. Still standing on the grounds assumed by its advocates, conceding, for the moment, that such a power is contained in the organic act as an enabling clause, what follows? The power thus given, is given to the Territorial Legislature, and it just as much belongs to the Legislature of 1857, as to the Legislature of 1855. The powers of the present Legislature are equal to the powers of the Legislature which called the convention to frame this constitution; and what that Legislature failed to do, this Legislature would have the power to do. If, when Governor Geary vetoed the bill passed by the Legislature of the Territory, instead of overriding his objections, they had provided, as he desired, that the constitution, when formed, should be submitted to a vote of the people for their ratification or rejection, does any person doubt that such a provision would be legal and binding on the convention? The Legislature is to have the power, if it have any, to prescribe for the authentication of the proceedings of the convention; for the mode of calling it; for the mode of certifying it. I do not say that the Legislature would have the right to prescribe what the convention should declare as the will of the people of Kansas in the formation of their government: not that the Legislature could declare properly what the constitution should or should not contain; but the Legislature, if it is to have any power, has power to give authenticity to the act of the convention; the mode of proving it; the mode in which the will of the people is to be expressed. The authority which one Legislature could exercise, another Legislature could exercise, and exercise at any time before the constitution framed by the convention, and the rights of the citizens under it, become fixed and vested; before it takes effect as a binding instrument. At any time before it becomes like a deed, executed, sealed, and delivered, the Legislature of the Territory have the right to intervene, to require an additional authentication, before it shall go forth as the expressed will of the people of Kansas. I know it will be urged that the convention might at once, under the law as it stood, have declared the constitution to be in force from the moment of their adjournment. But if they had that power, they did not exercise it. Instead of exercising the power of declaring that constitution to be in force, they referred it back, or a portion of it at least, for revision by the people before it should take effect. They declared "this constitution shall take effect and be in force from and after the ratification by the people, as hereinbefore provided." From and after the ratification it is to take effect; not before. When was that ratification to take place? On the 21st day of December. Before the 21st of December the Legislature of the Territory, then in session, passed a law requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection entire; and that law passed and took effect four days before the constitution took effect. Under that law, the constitution was submitted in fact to a vote of the people of the Territory, and was rejected by a majority of over ten thousand. If the constitution could not take effect until the 21st of December, it was still an unexecuted instrument; it was still like a deed undelivered, or a will, if you please, while the testator is still living; the time had not arrived when it was to take effect. Before that time arrives, the law-making power intervenes, and requires an additional certificate to its authenticity. Why, sir, take the simple case of a deed: you give a power of attorney to an individual to execute a deed; under that power he would have the absolute right to execute it, acknowledge it, and deliver it; and it would take effect against you. But suppose, instead of executing it and delivering it, he may have some doubt about some clause contained in it—the description, perhaps—and he sends it back to you to take advice on that question; and while the deed is being sent back, while the deed is in your hands still undelivered, the law-making power intervenes, and provides for an additional authentication; that instead of one, there shall be two witnesses, and instead of acknowledging it before one commissioner, you shall acknowledge it before a judge, to give it effect: what effect would that law have upon this instrument? It would prevent its taking legal effect as an instrument, because it was not in fact executed, sealed, and delivered, when the law intervened, and you refused to give it the additional authentication. The law of principal and agent is the same, from the simple servant-boy sent upon an errand by his master, his authority resting in parol, in mere word of mouth, to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Great Britain, commissioned by letters patent under the great seal of the Crown. It is just as true as to the one as the other, that at any time, at any moment before the authority is executed, the power may be revoked or modified, or rescinded altogether by the principal.

On this point, then, I maintain, in the first place, that no authority has ever been conferred upon the Territorial Legislature to call a convention to form a constitution for the people of Kansas; but if any such authority is anywhere to be found within the clauses of the organic act, the Legislature of that Territory lately elected, clothed with all the power which was given to the first, before the constitution became an executed thing, having force and effect, according to its own language, passed an act by which it was required that there should be an additional authentication of that instrument. I know that the gentlemen on the other side may say that this is a technical objection; that it is standing upon technical grounds. Is it not upon legal technicalities alone that they rest their defense of this constitution? Do they rest upon its justice or its fairness, because it is binding upon that people in honesty and good faith? No, sir. They rest upon it because they say it is technically the legally expressed will of the people of Kansas. If they choose to stand upon technicalities, it is just that they should fall by technicalities. If they will plant themselves upon the harsh rigor of the law, though it shall trample truth and justice and liberty under the iron heel of despotic power, let them remember that the same rigor of the law may bring that policy to the block. Take your "pound of flesh" if you will, because it is written in the bond; but not "one drop of Christian blood," because it is not written in the bond; "for, as thou urgest justice, be assured thou shalt have justice."

But, Mr. President, waiving these technicalities, advancing one step further in the examination of this important question whether Kansas should be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, I desire to examine whether, in a more enlarged or liberal sense, the Lecompton constitution is binding in equity upon the people of Kansas, even if you go upon the ground that the Legislature of 1855 was the legal Territorial Legislature of Kansas. I shall not controvert the doctrine which is assumed upon the other side; for I believe it to be true, that if a fair opportunity to vote be given, and a majority of a people choose to refrain from exercising that franchise, and stay away from the polls, they cannot complain of those who may choose to exercise that prerogative. They, by staying away, silently acquiesce in whatever the majority may do who choose to vote.

Now I come to the all-important question so often put upon this floor, and repeated in public newspapers and in private conversation, why did not the free-State people of Kansas, if they are in a majority, as they claim to be so largely, go to the polls and vote for delegates to the convention which framed this constitution? There are, in my judgment, good and sufficient reasons why the election which took place for delegates should not be pleaded as an estoppel upon the people of Kansas—why they should not be concluded by its results; and I will briefly state some of them. The first is, that nearly one half of all the organized counties of that Territory were disfranchised, and without any fault of their own. They could by no means whatever take any part in the election of delegates, if they would. Mr. Walker, in speaking on that subject, says:

"That convention had vital, not technical defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment—as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses—by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly-organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken, and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters.

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention."

Mr. Stanton, the acting Governor of Kansas, under whom this registry was made and this census taken, says:

"There are thirty eight counties, gentlemen, in the Territory of Kansas, including the distant county of Arapahoe, In nineteen of these counties an imperfect register was obtained, giving a vote of nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one. In the other nineteen counties there was no census and no registration."

Now, I should like to know if this of itself is not a sufficient answer to the claim that the people of the Territory of Kansas are to be concluded by the action of that convention, that nearly one half, or quite one half of all the organized counties of the Territory, by no fault of their own, were entirely disfranchised? What reply is there to this?

But, again: in the other nineteen counties the census taken and registry made were so notoriously false and fraudulent, both in the omission of resident voters and in the insertion of the names of non-resident voters, that the people of the Territory could not be called upon, and in justice ought not to be called upon to place any confidence whatever in the fairness of the election to which they were invited. As this is the important point involved in this case, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read some authority for the truth of what I now state. The Leavenworth Times, a paper published at the city of Leavenworth, in an article published directly after this census was completed, said:

"Instead of reporting to the probate judge the names of all the legal voters of that county," he has omitted by fraud, accident, or mistake, at least one hundred free State voters in this town alone, many of whom are among the first settlers of the Territory, and are now among the most prominent men of the county. C. F. Currier, M. J. Parrott, H. J. Adams, (since chosen Mayor of Leavenworth by a large majority,) H. Miles More, E. Ross, H. P. Johnson, Jared Phillips, and many others who might be named, are men well known to the officer who took the census, and have a bona fide residence in this town, and have lived here longer than one half of the persons whose names have been registered."

All of these gentlemen were prominent men living in the city of Leavenworth, well known to the officers who took the census. It further says that there were three printing offices in the city of Leavenworth; two of them free-State printing offices, and one a pro-slavery printing office. In taking the census not a man belonging to either of the free-State printing offices was placed upon the registry.

Again, sir, I read an extract from the history of Kansas and the administration of Governor Geary, by Dr. Gihon, the private secretary of Governor Geary. In speaking of this law and the taking of the census under it, he says:

"It provides for the taking of a census preparatory to an election to be held in June, 1857, for delegates to a convention to frame a State constitution, to be presented to the next Congress for its approval. At the election no citizen is allowed to vote who was not in the Territory on or before the 15th of March. The census takers and judges of election are the sheriff and other officers appointed by the pro-slavery party, and bound to its interests.

"Agreeably to this regulation, hundreds of free-State men who had been forcibly driven from their claims and homes during the past year's disturbances, and who, in consequence of the difficulty of travel, could not return until after the 15th of March, were disfranchised, as were also the thousands of emigrants that were expected to arrive after that period, and prior to the day fixed for the election. Whilst on the other hand, thousands of Missourians could simply cross the border into the Territory, register their names as voters, and return to their homes to await the election. But even that trouble was at length considered unnecessary, for the sheriffs and census takers found it more convenient to carry their books into Missouri and there record their names. Although 'this was really done, the names of many of the most prominent and oldest free-State residents of the Territory were never registered.'"

To what kind of an entertainment were the people of Kansas invited when they were invited to take part in that election under such a registry and such a census as that?

There is another reason why the people of that Territory should not be concluded and estopped by the election of delegates to the convention. It is this: by the written pledge of honor given by several of its members previous to their election, the people of Kansas were assured, and they had reason to believe, that the constitution to be formed at Lecompton should be submitted to them for their approval or rejection. I read the pledge:

To the Democratic voters of Douglas county:

It having been stated by that abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolution, which was adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN, A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS, H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLING, JOHN M. WALLACE,
W. T. SPICELY, L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself, fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers of this Territory, as the majority of voters shall decide."

The "slander" was, that they were not about to submit the constitution, to be formed by the convention at Lecompton, to the people for ratification or rejection!

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to ask him the question, how those gentlemen voted in the convention on the question of submitting the constitution or not submitting it? I desire, also, to call his attention to this other fact: if the law calling them, or the proclamation of the Governor, or any other common understanding of the country, created a just expectation that the constitution would be submitted, why was it deemed necessary to exact a special pledge in the county of Douglas? How did they vote? I will answer, that they all voted in favor of submission; but they were overruled by the delegates of other counties.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Missouri asks the question, how these gentlemen voted in the convention? They may have voted, as he alleges, for the submission of the constitution. I am not at this moment advised, of my own knowledge, of the fact, but it, in no respect whatever, varies the inducements which were held out to the people of Kansas to believe that the constitution would be submitted for their ratification or rejection. This pledge was signed by Mr. Calhoun and the leading men of the convention; and the pledge was given under such circumstances that it affected not merely the electors of Douglas county, but affected the action of the electors throughout the whole Territory.

Here I will notice a point which was taken by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] He claims that these men were released from their pledge by those persons who elected them—by their political friends. He felt the force of the blow and endeavored to parry it, but the answer which he gives is, in my judgment, just no sufficient answer. A pledge given by a public man before an election may just as well affect the action of those who oppose his election as those who sustain it. It may induce them not to vote against him. It may induce them not to take any part to prevent his election. But there is another reason why the people of the Territory of Kansas should not be estopped by the result of that election, and that is this: the Administration at Washington, in every form in which an Administration can be bound in honor and in good faith, gave the people of Kansas to believe, and to understand, that it was a part of their policy on which they would insist, that the constitution about to be formed at Lecompton, in Kansas, should be submitted to the people of that Territory for their ratification or rejection. I maintain that by the action of the President himself, by his own inaugural address, in which he declared it to be "the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion, by his vote;" by his instructions to Governor Walker, in which he declared in his official capacity, "when such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence;" by the often repeated declarations of Governor Walker himself to the people of Kansas, that he accepted of the appointment of Governor of Kansas upon the express condition that he should advocate the submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas, for their ratification or rejection; by his declaration to the people of Kansas, that it was so understood by the President, and every member of his Cabinet, that it was acquiesced in by them, that in that respect, he and the President, and the Cabinet were united, that the constitution should be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection; by all these assurances the people of Kansas had the right to believe, and they did believe, that the Administration stood pledged to the submission of the constitution to a fair vote of the bona fide actual settlers of the Territory, without being interrupted by fraud or by violence. How could they think otherwise? How could there be two opinions about it? Has it, indeed, come to this that no meaning is to be given to the inaugural address of the President of the United States while his oath of office is yet warm upon his lips? What a spectacle do we present to the whole civilized world! Have we indeed descended so low in the depths of official demoralization, that the people of the United States can no longer place any reliance upon the official messages, proclamations, and declarations of their highest functionaries?

Sir, I maintain that the people of Kansas had the right to believe, and they did believe, that the Administration, through its chosen organs in Kansas, Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, as well as by the inaugural address of the President, and the letter of instructions to Governor Walker, stood pledged—pledged in honor, pledged in good faith—that the constitution to be formed at Lecompton should be submitted for their ratification or rejection. They had a right, not only to believe it, but to insist upon it; and the people of these United States, who are about to take this whole Kansas policy into their own hands, have a right to insist that the Congress of the United States shall see to it that every pledge and assurance thus given shall be, in letter and in spirit and in perfect good faith, fulfilled to the people of Kansas; that no such instrument, formed as this Lecompton constitution was, shall be forced upon that people against their will.

The President insists that the whole opposition of the people of Kansas to the Lecompton constitution grows out of the slavery question, and further, that the slavery question has been fairly submitted to the people of Kansas, and they should be concluded by the result of the election upon that submission. With all due deference to the President of the United States, I shall maintain that the slavery question was more important than any other one question which agitated the people of Kansas, yet there are many other grounds of opposition to the adoption of the Lecompton constitution by the people of Kansas, upon which they had no opportunity to vote whatever. Governor Walker says:

"I state it as a fact, based on a long and intimate association with the people of Kansas, that an overwhelming majority of that people are opposed to that instrument, and my letters state that but one out of twenty of the press of Kansas sustains it. Some oppose it because so many counties were disfranchised and unrepresented in the convention. Some who are opposed to paper money, because it authorizes a bank of enormous capital for Kansas, nearly unlimited in its issues, and in the denomination of its notes, from one dollar up and down. Some because of what they consider a Know-Nothing clause, by requiring that the Governor shall have been twenty years a citizen of the United States. Some because the elective franchise is not free, as they cannot vote against the constitution, but only on the single issue, whether any more slaves may be imported, and then only upon the issue by voting for the constitution to which they are opposed. They regard this as but a mockery of the elective franchise, and a perilous sporting with the sacred rights of the people. Some oppose because the constitution distinctly recognizes and adopts the Oxford fraud in apportioning legislative members for Johnson county, upon the fraudulent and fictitious returns, so falsely called, from that precinct, which recognition of that fraud in the constitution is abhorrent to the moral sense of the people. Others oppose because, although in other cases the presidents of conventions have been authorized to issue writs of election to the regular territorial or State officers with the usual judges, with the established precincts and adjudication of returns, in this case unprecedented and vice regal powers are given to the president of the convention to make the precincts, the judges, and to decide finally upon the returns."

"From the grant of these unusual and enormous powers, and from other reasons connected with the fraudulent returns of Oxford and McGee, an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas have no faith in the validity of these returns, and therefore will not vote."

But I maintain that the slavery question in no just sense was submitted to the people of Kansas at all. The only question submitted to them was the constitution with slavery under the slavery article; or the constitution with slavery under the slavery schedule. It was to be a slave State in any event. So it was understood by all the politicians and presses who are to be regarded as among the leaders of the slavery extending policy. The Charleston Mercury says:

"We do not think that the question of slavery or no slavery is submitted to the vote of the people. Whether the clause in the constitution is voted out or voted in, slavery exists and has a guarantee in the constitution that it shall not be interfered with."

It is expressly provided in the constitution that if the slavery article be stricken out, the property in the slaves then existing in the Territory shall never be interfered with. So far as the slaves then-existing in the Territory are concerned, it is much more severe under the schedule than it is under the slavery article. Under the slavery article it is provided that you can emancipate the slaves in the Territory upon making compensation. Under the slavery article, it is provided that you can prevent the importation of slaves even into the Territory after you have abolished slavery within the State of Kansas.

But let us look a little more closely into the provisions of this constitution, as to the question whether slavery was actually submitted at all to the people of Kansas. I call your attention, and the attention of any person accustomed to the consideration of legal questions, who has a seat on this floor, and I put home the question to him: how, if the slavery article were stricken out of the constitution of Kansas, could a free negro, by whatever means taken into the Territory of Kansas, assert his freedom? If a slaveholder living in Missouri should embark his slaves on board a boat to cross the river into Kansas, and land with his slaves upon the soil of Kansas, with your slavery article stricken out, how could they obtain or assert their freedom? One provision in this constitution declares that "free negroes shall not be permitted to live in Kansas, under any circumstances." There is another provision which declares that no freeman shall be exiled from Kansas. A negro, therefore, if free, shall not live in Kansas; and a negro, if free, shall not be exiled from Kansas. How can he assert his freedom? Can he go into any court in Kansas and assert it? If he apply for a habeas corpus, if he bring a suit for his freedom, he is estopped by the constitution from saying that he is a freeman—a free negro in Kansas.

Sir, under the provisions of the Lecompton constitution, a free negro could not enter the courts of Kansas alive, and be permitted to say, "I am free." He is estopped from saying that he is a free man anywhere on the soil of Kansas, under that constitution, even with your slavery article stricken out. Under that constitution, no matter by what means a negro is taken there, but one alternative is presented. The courts of Kansas will not suffer him to enter alive, and say that he is free; the courts of the United States are closed against him because of his African descent. There is, therefore, under that constitution, but one dread alternative presented to a negro in Kansas, by whatever means he goes there—slavery or death. He has no remedy whatever. Take it all in all, the greatest mistake—I ought to say, the boldest and the most unfounded of all assumptions by which it is sought to bolster up the Lecompton constitution—is the assumption that the question of slavery was ever submitted at all to the people of that Territory. I know of but one bolder and more unfounded assumption, and that is, that it was fairly submitted to the people of the Territory.

For one moment I should like to go with one of the honorable Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, back in imagination to the 21st of December. Let us suppose that we placed ourselves at the polls in Kansas, desiring to exercise rights as citizens of Kansas. From our position and education and convictions, it would be very reasonable to suppose that we might differ entirely as to the policy of the introduction of the institution of slavery into that State. I should desire to vote against it. He might desire to vote in its favor. We present ourselves at the polls. He challenges my vote; I challenge his. Before either of us can deposit our ballots, we are required to take an oath to support this constitution when it is adopted, and as there can be no vote whatever against it, it must of necessity be adopted. We look into its provisions. We find incorporated into the body of that instrument, and as a part of its very essence, its representation based upon the fraudulent votes and returns from Johnson and McGee counties. I wish to put this question to him: could you take that oath and swear to support such a constitution, embracing within its provisions what is known to all the world to be infamously fraudulent?

But again, sir, I will go one step further. If the slavery article is adopted, it contains the following clause:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

I put the question home to the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.] suppose the schedule had provided that, in case this slavery article should be stricken from the constitution, the following should be substituted:

"No right of property exists or can exist in man or his offspring; slaves are the fruit of the slave trade, which is declared to be piracy, and punishable with death; slaveholding under all circumstances is a felony, and shall be punished as a crime."

I ask the honorable Senator, could he conscientiously take an oath to support a constitution containing such a provision? Sir, I know not how others may feel, but I would not take an oath to support a constitution which declares the right of property in man to be higher and above any constitutional sanction, and that in that respect the constitution should never be altered. I would not take an oath to support such a constitution under any circumstances—no, sir, though the grave should open before me in one single hour.

The oath which I have supposed to have been put to the Senator from Louisiana was not put to the pro-slavery voters in Kansas to compel them to remain absent from the polls and take no part in the election; but precisely that oath, which I have supposed to be put to myself, was put to every free-State man in Kansas who would offer to vote upon the constitution—an oath, against which his whole early education, every principle which he maintains, revolts. It produced precisely the effect which was intended—it drove the free-State men from the polls en masse. It effected precisely that, and that only, for which it was deliberately contrived and intended. I ask the honorable gentleman, is it just or fair to say that the people of Kansas, the free-State men of Kansas, have had an opportunity to vote on this question, when, as a precedent to their voting, you compel them to take an oath which they cannot take without bringing moral perjury upon themselves? If it had provided that a pro-slavery man, who desired to vote for the introduction of slavery, should take an oath that it was a crime and a felony under all circumstances, would that be a fair submission to a pro-slavery man? When it is contended and maintained by the President of the United States that the question of slavery has been fairly submitted to the people of Kansas, I assure you, sir, it must be based upon some logic which I cannot understand, which the people of the United States do not understand, and cannot be made to understand. There must be a "delusion" somewhere.

But, to return, the election was soon to come off in Kansas. The constitution itself was not submitted to the people; they were to have no fair opportunity to vote upon the slavery question; what was to be done? Let Mr. Stanton, acting Governor of the Territory, under these circumstances, speak for himself. Speaking of the condition of the people of the Territory, under these circumstances, and as this vote was about to be taken, he says:

"You may well imagine they were deeply excited; they were stirred to the very depths of the popular heart."

Mr. GREEN. Let me ask the Senator when he said it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In his speech in New York.

Mr. GREEN. Ah.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He is speaking since the event.

Mr. GREEN. Not while he was Governor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir. I read from his speech in New York, speaking of the condition of affairs which existed in the Territory:

"You may well imagine that the people of the Territory were deeply excited; they were stirred to the very depths of the popular heart. Their murmurs were loud, their outcries were boisterous, their threats were strong and violent. I could not much blame them for almost anything that they might have been disposed to do under the circumstances. They called upon me, in the absence of Governor Walker, as acting Governor of the Territory to give them what relief I could. What was I to do? What could I do under the circumstances? I saw the iniquity that had been perpetrated before my eyes in spite of my efforts, in spite of the authority and of the resistance of Governor Walker and myself, in spite of the threats and murmurs of the people; I saw the thing done before my eyes, in the face of the world; the vilest wrong that had ever been perpetrated against any people. I learned, what to me was not at all astonishing, that in their great meetings they had ever contemplated the destruction of General John Calhoun, and every man who, by the terms of that constitution, they regarded as participants in carrying it into effect. I saw John Calhoun afterward, on the result of that state of feeling, under the necessity of going into the Territory after his own office—the most important, or at least the most profitable, office in the whole Territory, the occupant of which is clothed with more patronage than any other officer; I saw him guarded by dragoons of the United States, to protect him against the just indignation of the people. Well, gentlemen, as I, in the simplicity of my heart, thought that the people were entitled to such relief as I could give them, I thought that they asked me simply to call a Legislature of their own election, in order to give them some relief; I thought it was my duty to do what they asked. I called that Legislature together; and if again I should hear the murmurs of that distracted people, if again I should look into their glaring eyes, if again I should hear the despairing cries coming upon my ears, calling upon me for assistance—I say, if the President, with all his Cabinet, were standing in my path, frowning and threatening discredit, dismissal, death, anything, I would do it again."

Thus speaks out a noble and a generous heart. Though he went to that Territory prejudiced against the free-State men of Kansas; though, to use his own language, he went there as a border ruffian; though he went there desiring to make it a slave State by every means which he could honorably use; yet when he came to go over that Territory and to learn the true state of the affairs of its people; when he saw them trodden under foot by an insolent and tyrannical minority, backed up by the Army and the Administration at Washington, he could no more refrain from giving utterance to the truth, and the whole truth, than he could hold coals of fire in his own bosom.

But what were the actual results of this election on the 21st of December? There were nominally six thousand one hundred and forty-three votes given. Of those, three thousand and twelve were given in Johnson and Leavenworth counties, at Oxford, Shawnee, and Kickapoo; and the Speaker of the Assembly and the President of the Council declare, "from our personal knowledge of the settlements in and around the above places we have no hesitation in saying that the great bulk of those votes were fraudulent."

By this morning's paper it is announced that in this very city is a Mr. Green, direct from Kansas, with the proof in his hands to show that there were but two thousand five hundred legal votes cast on the 21st of December in that Territory. What great men voted in Kansas at Kickapoo on that famous day? James Buchanan, President of the United States, William H. Seward, Thomas F. Marshall, George W. Brown, John C. Fremont, John Herndon, and Thomas H. Benton, are among the voters recorded at Kickapoo on the 21st of December!

What was the vote which took place on the 4th of January? The Lecompton constitution was submitted to the people of Kansas, and was rejected by a majority of over ten thousand votes. No question has been raised as to the legality of the votes that were given on that day.

Do you ask any more witnesses to prove the truth of what I say? I do not propose to call witnesses who were friendly to the Republican party at the time they became acquainted with the facts. I will call the witnesses whom you yourselves have sent to the Territory of Kansas—five Governors in succession, one after another; and what is their united testimony? Governor Reeder, Governor Geary through his private secretary, Governor Stanton, Governor Walker, and even Governor Shannon; and, if you will delay your action upon this Lecompton constitution for three months longer, until Governor Denver can become well acquainted with the situation of affairs in Kansas, my life upon it, we shall be able to call him as the next witness to prove the same truth. Strip this question of all its disguises, and express it in one single word; and what is it, and what has it been from the beginning? Simply whether the minority of the people in that Territory, backed up by the Administration at Washington, shall form a constitution establishing slavery in Kansas, and bring it into the Union against the will of the majority; or whether the majority of that people shall be permitted peacefully to form their own constitution, and come into the Union as a free, independent, and sovereign State? That is the question now; it was the question in 1856; it was the question in the beginning, and from before the beginning; and there has been no other question from the fall of 1853 down to the present hour.

I desire not to trespass upon the patience of the Senate; but I wish to state briefly some facts only, to justify the declaration which I have now made. In the spring of 1853, when Congress adjourned, it left undisposed the Nebraska bill. No person at that time entertained the idea of a repeal of the Missouri compromise. Mr. Atchison, who up to that time had opposed the passage of the bill, came to its support. He declared that he was prepared to submit to the compromise, as there was no longer any hope of repealing it. He returned to his home in western Missouri. During the fall of 1853, months before the Kansas-Nebraska bill was agitated in Congress, or in the country, Mr. Atchison attended some meetings in the border counties of Missouri; and to one of those meetings, an account of which was extensively published through the country at the time, I beg leave to call your attention. It was a meeting at which Mr. Atchison himself made a speech, an account of which was given in the "Platte Argus."

In one of those resolutions it was declared that they were opposed to opening the Territory for settlement; in another, that, if it were open for settlement, the Missouri compromise should be repealed; and a third resolution was that, "if it be open for settlement, we pledge ourselves to each other to extend the institutions of Missouri over the Territory, cost what it may of blood or treasure." This meeting and these resolutions, though extensively published throughout the country, attracted but very little attention; but from the history of subsequent events there has been given to those resolutions a deep and momentous significance. From his home in Missouri he returned here to his place in the Senate. On the 16th of January, 1854, the proposition first appeared from the then Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Dixon] to repeal the Missouri compromise. I shall pass over that session of Congress when this great matter was discussed. The bill became a law on the 30th of May following. Mr. Atchison returned from his place here to his home in Missouri. The election which was first to come off in Kansas was to take place on the 29th of November following for the choice of a delegate to Congress. I read from the history of Kansas by the private secretary of Governor Geary:

"Several weeks previous to this election, General B. F. Stringfellow, ex-Vice President David R. Atchison, and other prominent citizens of that State, addressed large meetings in Missouri, urging the people 'to enter every election district in Kansas, in defiance of Reeder and his vile myrmidons, and vote at the point of the bowie-knife and revolver.' The cause, it was urged, demanded it, and 'it was enough that the slave holding interest wills it, from which there is no appeal'; and, if the pro-slavery party should be 'defeated, then Missouri and the other southern States will have shown themselves recreant to their interest, and will deserve their fate.'"

The issue was distinctly stated by Mr. Whitfield himself, in a speech shortly after that election, as follows:

"We can recognize but two parties in the Territory—the pro-slavery and the anti-slavery parties. If the citizens of Kansas want to live in this community at peace, and feel at home, they must become pro-slavery men; but, if they want to live with gangs of thieves and robbers, they must go with the Abolition party. There can be no third party—no more than two issues—slavery and no slavery in Kansas territory."

At that election there were two thousand eight hundred and seventy-one votes given, of which one thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine were found to be illegal, every one of which illegal votes was cast for Mr. Whitfield. But this election, which took place on the 29th of November, was a very small affair compared with what was to come off when it was to be determined who should hold the legislative power of the Territory. At that time, (and it is a fact beyond all dispute; I have authorities before me going to demonstrate it,) nearly five thousand men, non-residents of Kansas, entered into the Territory, took possession of every council district, and every assembly district but one in the Territory, and chose every member of the Legislature with a single exception. After that election was over, from the same newspaper to which I have referred, the Platte Argus, jubilant expressions of victory were heard. The declaration was made. "They (the Missourians) have conquered Kansas. Our advice to them is, let them hold it or die in the attempt." I shall not pursue the history of that transaction. The report and speech of my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] are conclusive to show that from that usurpation, from the moment that armed body of men took possession of the Territory of Kansas, down to the time when the Leecompton constitution was framed, there never has been a moment that the power of the usurpers has not reigned supreme in that Territory, sustained by the Administration at Washington.

But one thing remained, and that was to induce the Administration at Washington, after they had accomplished this result, to acquiesce in the usurpation. Then commenced the most memorable struggle in the Congress of the United States which this country has ever witnessed; the President upon the one side, with a large majority of the Senate and the House of Representatives with a small minority on the other. The whole question which underlay that controversy was simply this, nothing more and nothing less: shall the Congress of the United States, by law set aside or acquiesce in this usurpation. That struggle was a long one. For a long time it was a doubtful one; it was an earnest one; but at length the Executive by the power of the Administration brought to bear, succeeded. From that hour to the present moment, the Executive has declared and insisted that the laws passed by that Territorial Legislature should be enforced by the whole power of the Government and at the point of the bayonet. From that moment there has been no relaxation in the grasp of that usurpation. They feel it now; it is resting upon them still, and the crowning object of the whole, the ripened fruit of that usurpation, and for which it was done, is this Leecompton constitution. Yes, sir, as it was resolved before the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, in western Missouri, at the meeting at which Mr. Atchison made his speech, that they would carry the institutions of Missouri into Kansas at whatever cost of blood or of treasure, they did organize, they did take possession of Kansas by force of arms, they did elect the Legislature of Kansas, by which, in three short weeks of a session they did extend the whole code of Missouri over the Territory, adding to it some provisions of their own, so atrocious and damnable in their character, that no member of Congress in either House has ever yet dared to stand up and defend them.

But, Mr. President, I fear that I have trespassed upon the time and the patience of the Senate already. I desire to say but a very few words more and I shall have done. It was during that struggle in Congress, and while it was pending, that the Republican party proper commenced its organization at Pittsburg, on the 22d of February, 1856. During that struggle, as the presidential election was coming off, I admit there were many individuals for whose intelligence I have the highest respect, and whose patriotism and integrity of character I have no reason to doubt, who not only did not believe, but whom no evidence which could then be produced could make believe, that any such state of things in fact existed. It was denounced as mere political exaggeration got up for political purposes for the advancement of a political party. They closed their eyes; they closed their ears; they did as the honorable Senator from South Carolina says that he has intended to do—they chose to remain ignorant of the facts transpiring in Kansas. They could not be made to believe that such a state of things could possibly exist in this country as that there should be a deliberate and an organized invasion, and actual subjugation of one of the Territories of the United States by force of arms for the purpose of establishing slavery in the Territory against the will of the people.

But the veil has now been drawn aside. It has been drawn aside under such circumstances, it has been drawn aside by such hands, that they can no longer disbelieve. The witnesses who now stand before the public to prove the truth of the transactions in Kansas, are not a committee sent out by the House of Representatives. They are not the political friends of the Republican party. No, sir; they are the witnesses whom you have chosen to send out as your own chosen agents—the witnesses to whom I have already referred—five Governors in succession, who, though they have gone out there prejudiced against the people, with prejudiced eyes, not prepared to see the truth, yet have been conquered in spite of their prejudices, and have been converted by the people of Kansas from political enemies into warm self-sacrificing friends. They are the men of your own choice. I ask, by what miracle of power is it that the people of Kansas have conquered all these Governors that have been sent out there to administer their affairs. The secret of their power consists in the simple fact that what they say, and what they have said from the beginning, is true in relation to that Territory.

Mr. President, I have gone over the history of this transaction much more rapidly than I could have desired; but I have done. There stands the fact. It can no more be doubted that there was a regularly organized invasion and subjugation of that Territory, and the imposition of that Legislature, than there can be a doubt that Cæsar crossed the Rubicon, or that Cornwallis surrendered to General Washington. There stands the indisputable, the overwhelming, the appalling truth, recorded upon the page of our history. No sophistry can obscure it; no special pleading, dictated by partisan blindness or mad ambition, can withdraw it from the sight. Though it sear the eye-balls, it will not down at your bidding. There it stands, and will continue to stand, when you and I and all of us shall have gone to render an account of our stewardship, and the part we may have borne in these transactions, to the Lord of lords and the King of kings, when all that is mortal of us shall long since have moldered into ashes. Though centuries shall have passed away, American liberty, as she looks upon that page, may strive to obliterate it, but in vain. No mantle of her shame will be broad enough to cover it. No tears of her anguish can wash it away. The blood of her sons, though it flow in torrents, cannot drown it out of sight.

But one more act remains to make the page of infamy complete. Pass this bill, and it is done. Pass this bill, and the historian will record upon the page of history, for after generations, there to remain forever, that in the same year in which Russia proclaims freedom to her bondmen, and the whole civilized world is exultant with rejoicing at the act, republican America, trampling under foot its own Declaration of Independence, and every principle of self-government, by force of arms established a State government in Kansas for the purpose of extending the institution of slavery into that State against the will of its inhabitants.

Mr. HAMLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to interpose a remark? Does he desire to proceed to-night?

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] suggests to me—I suppose there is no impropriety in my saying what the suggestion is—that he would like to occupy a very short time this evening. It will be very agreeable to me to yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. GREEN. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President—

Mr. YULEE. I ask the Senator, if agreeable to him, to give way for a motion for an executive session.

Mr. FOSTER. I prefer not. I wish to be heard a short time, and prefer going on now.

Mr. YULEE. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, after the intimation which was given us by the honorable Senator from Missouri, representing the majority of the Territorial Committee, that the vote on this question is to be taken on Monday next, it struck me that those who proposed to be heard on this subject had better be prompt in their action. I certainly received it as kind in the honorable Senator to give us this early notice, for I was one of those who had been making some preparation to address the Senate upon the subject now pending. I have made some few notes and memoranda on the subject, but I had not expected to speak upon it to-day, and I have not those notes or memoranda here; but, sir, I have before me the constitution which it is proposed to impose on the people of Kansas by this body, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to that constitution, and to urge a few of the reasons why I, as a member of the Senate, can never vote to admit Kansas under that constitution, and with the provisions and principles which it contains, though everything else in regard to the subject was as I could wish it to be.

In the first place, I cannot vote to admit a State into this Confederacy which lies north of 36° 30' north latitude, having slavery as a provision of its constitution. I recognize the Missouri compromise of 1820 as still binding upon the people of this country, notwithstanding the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854. I am one of those who mean to be bound by that compromise, to act upon it here, at least so far forth as never to vote for the admission of a State lying north of that line, which State proposes to establish African slavery. I believe that compromise was entered into in good faith. I believe that it conducted to the peace of the country for a long course of years. I believe there was no necessity for its repeal. I believe that its repeal was a violation of plighted faith. I believe it was an outrage upon the moral sense of the nation, and it ought not to have been done. I therefore will recognize the old compromise, and will never recognize the repeal.

Inasmuch as this constitution proposes to establish slavery in the future State of Kansas, and to establish it in a most offensive and obnoxious form—if that were all, I could not vote for its admission. The article to which I call the attention of the Senate is the seventh article of the Leecompton constitution, which is before us. The first section of that article reads thus:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave, and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

That section contains a principle which, in my judgment, is false in morals, false in politics, and false in law. I will never vote for the admission of a State into this Union with a provision so obnoxious as that. If we were admitting a State lying far south, there would be no necessity for the enunciation of a doctrine like that. Even although the State might tolerate and establish slavery, it need not do it in that most offensive form. It is flying in the face of Christendom in a manner which I cannot justify or tolerate. I do not believe that here, in the latter half of the nineteenth century of the Christian era, it is to be laid down as a fundamental principle in a constitution which is required to be republican in its form, that the right of property by man in man is prior to all constitutional law, and is as inviolable as the right to any property whatever. I believe that the enunciation of a principle so glaringly false as that, is a reproach and a shame to the age in which we live. It is going backward in a very rapid manner to barbarism, rather than forward to a higher civilization and greater freedom.

The other provisions in the same article of the constitution in regard to the manner in which slavery shall be controlled by the Legislature, are exceedingly obnoxious to me. It is, however, particularly to the principle which is enunciated in the first section that I make more immediate objection.

I shall not, at this late hour of the day, go over all the provisions in this constitution to which I make exception; but I will call attention to some few, besides the one to which I have already alluded. I find laid down, as a part of the bill of rights of this incipient State, this proposition:

"Free negroes shall not be permitted to live in this State under any circumstances."

I do not believe that a provision like that should be in a constitution which we are about to approve, or that such a constitution can be called republican in its form.

Mr. GREEN. I would remind the Senator that the Topeka constitution has a similar provision in it.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I am advised, the Topeka constitution has never been adopted by the Senate, has never brought a State into this Union, and if it has any such provision in it as that, I apprehend it will never obtain my vote. I do not believe that the Topeka constitution has any such provision in it; but whether that constitution, or any other has, it makes no difference with me on this occasion.

Whether free negroes are citizens, or whether they can be citizens of the United States or not, it is admitted, this constitution admits, that they are men. The very clause of this constitution which creates slavery, and other portions of it, provides how slaves may become emancipated and be free men. Another provision of this instrument is, that no free man shall be exiled from the State. Under this constitution, a man who is a slave may be emancipated by the laws of the State in a constitutional manner, and he becomes then, of course, a freeman—a negro, it is true, but free by the constitution and the laws of the State of Kansas. That negro cannot be exiled from the State, because he is a free man. He cannot live in the State, because he is a negro and a free man. What is the result? He must be put to death. There is no question about the result at which we arrive. A slave may be emancipated and become a free negro, and he is then to be offered a sacrifice. The manner is not provided in the constitution, but he is to be offered a sacrifice. At all events he must be killed, for we must abide by the constitution; the Legislature can make no law which shall give the free negro a right to live a day, because there can be no law violating the constitution. The negro, when made free under the constitution and the laws of the State which originally made him a slave, is to be put to death. He is to be put to death because he has been made a free man, as it may be, against his will.

Is a constitution having provisions like these in it, republican in its form? If it be, it is certainly not republican in its spirit, and I am for going behind forms and looking at the substance. Where a constitution has such gross, barbarous provisions as those to which I have called attention, I can never vote to add to the constellation of American States one that recognizes such principles.

Will it be said that no doubt the intention was that the negro could go out of the State? Why, sir, if the will of certain men is to control public affairs for the next twenty or fifty years, Kansas may be surrounded with slave States, and those slave States will each and all of them have the right, if this may be recognized as rightful and legal, to provide that no free negro shall ever come within their limits; and what will be the result? The negro, after he becomes free in Kansas, cannot get out of the State; he cannot pass beyond the line of the State. If he goes to Missouri, the law of Missouri may condemn him to death the moment he comes within its jurisdiction; so may the Territory of Nebraska, if that should become a State with this "blessing" of slavery attached to it, and it should be disposed to keep out free negroes. So of all other States beyond the line of Kansas.

Mr. GREEN. Let me make one remark, with the Senator's permission. More of the non-slaveholding States in the Union than of the slaveholding States, have provisions of law prohibiting free negroes from coming into their borders. I assert that here, and am responsible for the assertion. If the slave should even go through the State of Missouri, and get into Illinois, there is a prohibition—the very thing he is complaining of in Kansas.

Mr. FOSTER. So much the worse for the free negro. Should Kansas then be surrounded with free States, and the disposition of which the Senator speaks be carried out in those free States, there is no possible salvation for this negro; he must be killed. The gentleman does not help the constitution out of the difficulty.

Mr. GREEN. Does the Senator undertake to intimate that the law of Illinois, or any other of the non-slaveholding States, requires the free negro to be killed? If so, it is not correct; and I only mention this fact to show that the Senator's argument is an absurdity.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be to the honorable Senator an absurdity. I have not asserted that any of the States have made the penalty death for a free negro to enter. I have only been arguing that if a free negro attempts to stay in Kansas, the constitution, in so many words, requires him to be put to death. I have alluded to the fact that if that provision of the constitution be one rightful and proper, all surrounding States would have a right to pass a similar law, making the penalty death for any free negro to come within the State; and if they should do so, I say there could be no possible escape for the negro; and if they should not do so, still, inasmuch as under this constitution no free man can be exiled from the State, he has therefore a right to remain; and if he should remain he must be put to death. While that constitution stands, the absurdity of the argument simply is this: that a black man shall not be permitted to live in the State free, under any circumstances. He may be made free, and there is no power known to the constitution to put him out; on the contrary, the constitution provides that he shall not be put out. Now, I beg the honorable Senator, who seems keen on the subject of absurdity, to point out what possible mode there is for a free black to live in the State of Kansas under these two provisions—that he shall not live in the State free, under any circumstances, and yet that there is no power known to the constitution to get him out?

Mr. GREEN. Do you want an answer?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, if the honorable Senator wishes to answer.

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator desires an answer, he shall have it. I answer that the same provision in Kansas for getting him out exists, independent of law, as exists in Illinois, to get him out of Illinois, and other non-slaveholding States; and yet prohibition is as positive in those non-slaveholding States as it is in the State of Kansas; and more than that, it is not to be expected that a constitution will provide all the means to execute itself. There are a thousand provisions in the State constitutions, and in the United States Constitution, which require the aid of the legislative power to provide the means to execute and carry them out.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable gentleman has failed to give an answer that at all meets the exigencies of the case. He refers me to the State of Illinois and other States where the provision, he says, is equally positive that free blacks shall not live, as it is here. There is no particular mode provided for getting the black out of the State. The answer simply removes the difficulty across the river; but if the difficulty exists there, it is just as great. I apprehend, however, that the constitution of Illinois does not contain exactly this same provision.

Mr. GREEN. It is the law of Illinois, not the constitution.

Mr. FOSTER. But here is a constitution which makes a man a slave and allows him to be made free, and then says when made free he shall not live in the State, and it contains another provision that no free man shall be exiled.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish at all to interfere in the discussion between the honorable Senator from Connecticut and the honorable Senator from Missouri, but I wish to say that there is no law in the State of Illinois providing that a free negro shall not live in the State.

Mr. GREEN. But there is a law that he shall not come in. Suppose he comes in: what do you do with him?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have a provision for disposing of him if he comes into the State. We have a statute law on that subject.

Mr. GREEN. How do you dispose of him? You set him up and sell him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Under our statutes we hire him.

Mr. GREEN. You sell him for a time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He is hired out for a particular length of time.

Mr. GREEN. Kansas will do the same thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a different provision.

Mr. FOSTER. If Kansas does the same thing, she will break her constitution.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. BRODERICK. I understand that it is the desire of the majority on this side of the Chamber to have an executive session; and that being the case, I ask the Senator from Connecticut to suspend his remarks until to-morrow. It is now four o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. I would give way with great pleasure to the request of the honorable Senator from California, but for the fact that I shall occupy only a short time longer.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senator will suspend his remarks until to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no! go on now.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall not occupy longer than ten minutes. I am exceedingly sorry to disoblige the Senator from California, if my going on now does disoblige him; but as I have only a few words to say, I may as well say them now.

Mr. BRODERICK. I would rather hear the Senator at greater length, and therefore I hope he will consent to postpone his remarks until to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator from Illinois, I have no doubt, has stated correctly the law of that State; but, in reply, the honorable Senator from Missouri says the State of Kansas would take the same course as the honorable Senator from Illinois says is provided under the law of Illinois in regard to free blacks. If so, I repeat, the State of Kansas would violate the provision of her constitution. Although hiring a man to service, as a penalty for the violation of the law, is unquestionably a severe penalty, yet it is less severe than death; and here the penalty, if it is anything, is and must be death. They have no more right to hire the man out, or to sell him and make him a slave over again, than they have to do any other possible act that the constitution has prohibited; for it is provided, in express terms, "free negroes shall not be permitted to live in the State under any circumstances." Besides, the difficulty is greater than the Senator from Missouri seems to suppose, comparing the provisions of this inchoate State with the State of Illinois, because the law of Illinois, as I understand the honorable Senator from that State, simply prohibits under penalties the coming into the State of a certain class of persons. That is not the case here. This constitution provides for a man's being created, so to speak, a free black on the soil of the State, who was there lawfully as a slave; it may be against his will, and we are to presume against his will. Being there on the soil of the State against his will, under the law he is made free, as it may be, against his will; and the penalty for being free is death. I say that is an arbitrary, despotic, outrageous principle—one which can never be tolerated in a country that has any idea of genuine liberty; and this is to be on a soil of all others in the United States blessed with perfect freedom.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, not for my information alone, but for the information of my people?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I understand him to make objections to the constitution of Kansas, because of what he alleges is contained in that constitution: as to the policy of the people of Kansas in regard to the condition of those who are slaves. Does the Senator understand that the Congress of the United States can look into a State constitution to see what the policy of the people of that State is in regard to the condition of service, whether for life or for any other time, and to reject a State because a Senator may disapprove its policy?

Mr. FOSTER. I do understand that the Congress of the United States when called upon by a Territory to admit that Territory into the constellation of States, as one of the members of this Federal Union, if it has in its constitution principles at war with those which underlie our Constitution, at war with the principles of our Declaration of Independence, at war with the plainest principles of liberty, that such a constitution cannot be Republican even in its form, and is therefore objectionable distinctly on that ground—that we cannot permit a State with such a constitution to become a member of this Confederacy.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman indulge me a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I am glad to hear his answer. It will throw a flood of light on this question before the people where there is this condition of African slavery. I understand the Senator to say that, conceding that Congress can look into the constitution of a State applying for admission only to see that it is republican in form, it is his judgment that where the condition of slavery is recognized, it is not republican in form, and therefore not to be admitted.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not asserted such a principle.

Mr. MASON. I understood that to be the conclusion at which the Senator arrived.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman may have drawn that as an inference, and if the language implies that, it is a fair inference; but that is not my understanding of the language, and with entire deference to the honorable Senator from Virginia, I do not think my language is fairly susceptible of that construction.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator, then, will restate it. I should like to be disabused of the inference I drew.

Mr. FOSTER. I may not restate it in the precise terms in which I stated it before, but I will do so as nearly as my recollection will enable me. My statement, in substance, was this: that where a constitution contained principles that were at war with the principles of our Federal Constitution, at war with the principles of our Declaration of Independence, at war with the plainest principles of freedom and liberty, recognized the world over, we could not call such a constitution republican in its form; and it would, therefore, be obnoxious to that objection, and the State would, therefore, not be entitled to admission.

Mr. MASON. Because it is not republican.

Mr. FOSTER. Because it is not republican, and because it is not recognizing the principles of freedom on which our Government is based. I by no means assert that, because a State constitution, or the constitution of an incipient State, in some form may recognize the existence of African slavery on its soil, that constitutes an insurmountable reason why we cannot admit it as a State. I should greatly prefer that all States would come in free; but I by no means go to the extent of saying that, under all circumstances, if that provision were wanting, for that reason alone a State should be kept out. I think it would be impolitic for a State to come in with a provision recognizing slavery in any form; but very clear am I that, where a State lays down a provision of the sort which I have read, it goes far beyond any exigency in regard to establishing African slavery. If it merely said what various State constitutions may at present say, in regard to the right of the master to hold slaves, under certain circumstances, within that State establishing, creating the "peculiar institution," it might not be obnoxious to the exception I am making to this provision. This lays down a principle, a fundamental principle, a radical principle, which is either false or true. I say it is false; and I say it without regard at all to the right of the several States now in the Union, or the right of those that may hereafter come in, to hold slaves. This principle is independent of that. It goes over and beyond it, and that is what I object to. I am not for interfering with the relation of master and slave in the honorable Senator's State. The trampling of this principle under foot does not at all affect the right of any State in this Union, in my judgment, to hold their slaves under their State constitutions. I meddle not with those relations, and would do nothing whatever to disturb them; but, sir, when a State comes here with a principle of this sort in its constitution, it challenges either my assent or denial; and I am compelled to deny its truth. A constitution containing such a principle is neither republican in form nor in spirit.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield for a moment? It is evident, from the interrogatories which have been put to the Senator, that he will occupy a great deal more of the time of the Senate this afternoon than he imagines; and therefore I ask him again to give way, for the purpose of going into executive session, so that he can have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I should have been through in this time if the honorable Senators had not interrupted me. I shall be through in five minutes.

Mr. BRODERICK. A great many Senators on this side of the House may put questions to the gentleman, and to answer would occupy more time than he imagines.

Mr. FOSTER. If such a case should happen, I assure the Senator I will take occasion at another time to answer them.

Mr. BRODERICK. I would consider it a favor if the Senator would give way for an executive session.

Several SENATORS, (to Mr. FOSTER.) Go on. The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) The Chair considers that the Senator from Connecticut declines to yield the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I do so, I assure the Senator from California, with every disposition to oblige him, and I shall disoblige him but for a few moments longer.

There is another provision in this constitution, which is the fourteenth section of the schedule, providing—

"After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and, if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that chose the Representatives; said delegates so elected, shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution, but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

That is an exceedingly obnoxious feature in this constitution, in my judgment. It is enough to condemn the whole instrument. I by no means agree with gentlemen who adopt the principle that a State constitution may be changed with such surprising facility as they argue that it may. I understand the honorable Senator from Missouri (for whose opinion and judgment as a lawyer, I certainly have respect) to say that the people of a State may change their constitution in "any legal way." It is a most indefinite expression. No doubt a State may change its constitution in any legal way. The question is, what is a legal way? The way pointed out in the constitution is the legal way in which the constitution of the State of Kansas, should it become a State, may be changed; and that, I assert, is the only legal mode in which that constitution, if it be adopted, can be changed. Granting that it may possibly be changed in some other way, and there be no bloodshed, it will still be revolution.

But, sir, it provides that "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves;" that is to say, slavery shall be a perpetual institution in the State that is to be the State of Kansas; it shall exist there through all time. That is the distinct and direct provision of this constitution. Now, I apprehend the honorable Senator from Missouri will not say that the Legislature of the State may call a convention of the people of that State, and if the people come together in that convention and vote to abolish slavery, or rather make a constitution containing an article which abolishes slavery, slavery would then be abolished in the State of Kansas. I apprehend the honorable Senator from Missouri will not say that can be done.

Mr. GREEN rose.

Mr. FOSTER. I have promised the honorable Senator from California to be brief, and if I were to be interrupted now it would prevent me from keeping my promise. If the gentleman will answer categorically, yes or no, it will take no time, and he can answer. Unless his response amounts to that I might not understand it. If the question is capable of being answered by yes or no, I shall understand it; but if it takes more words I might misunderstand it; and therefore perhaps it is not worth while now for me to give way to the Senator.

I agree that there have been States in this Confederacy which have changed their constitutions in a manner not provided for in the Constitution, and those States have been alluded to at various times to prove what is claimed to be an inalienable right of the people to alter, amend, or abolish their form of government whenever they please; but does it prove it? Because the State of New York, or any other State, has made an alteration, or has actually abolished an existing constitution, in a manner not provided for in that constitution, does it prove that such a change is legal—is not revolutionary? No, sir; it does not. It simply proves that those portions of the people who did not agree to that alteration, if there were any such, acquiesced in the change. Does anybody believe that the slaveholders in Kansas would acquiesce in the abolition of slavery in that State by a convention called by the Legislature emanating from the people? No, sir; nobody can believe it. If it be not within the power of the people under these circumstances to abolish slavery except according to the terms and provisions of the constitution, neither can they do anything else contrary to the provisions of the constitution without the acquiescence of the people. With that acquiescence it makes a bloodless revolution, but nevertheless a revolution.

In the Territory of Kansas, we know that the people are exceedingly divided in their sentiments in regard to government. We know that a very large portion—nineteen twentieths of the people of that Territory, as I believe—are in favor of having it a free State. One twentieth may be in favor of having it a slave State. Here, however, is a constitution which establishes slavery in it forever. Now, I say, establish this constitution, and it can never be lawfully abolished, except by consent of every slaveholder in the State of Kansas. If it can never be lawfully abolished except by the consent of every slaveholder in the State, it simply recognizes this principle, that where a right is secured under a constitution, and a mode is provided in that constitution for amending or altering it, that right can never be affected or taken away, except in the manner provided in the constitution itself. The acquiescence of every one whose right is to be affected has, no doubt, the same effect. And this principle is applicable not only to the owner of property, but the holder of office, as the judge of a court, a sheriff, or any other officer who might be holding an office under the old constitution. If the people, under this inalienable right that is talked about, should make a new constitution, elect new officers, ordain and establish new courts of justice, and set up a new State government, all those who are holding offices under the former constitution and under the old government, unless they chose to give up their positions and acquiesce in this revolution of their government, would be lawfully in the places to which they had been appointed under the original constitution and under the original law, and could call upon the Executive of the United States if they were about to be forcibly removed from their offices, or if their legal behests were not obeyed, and the Executive of the United States would be bound to call in the physical force of the country, the militia—the Army of the United States—to carry out and to execute the mandates and judgments of the original and lawful legal tribunals under the old constitution, and never allow those tribunals or those officers legally in power to be overthrown and displaced by the new claimants. Would the Supreme Court allow what gentlemen here call "property" to be disposed of by the will of the majority in any other manner than as provided in this constitution? No, sir; nobody believes it; and that is a test of the question, because there are other rights as dear as the right to property; and if that may not be done there is an end of this loose talk, as it seems to me, about the inalienable right of the people to govern themselves.

I believe in that right, Mr. President, as religiously as any other man; and I believe that when the people come together and make a compact of government, under which they agree to live, and prescribe how they may change it, it is their will and pleasure so to make it, and they are bound by it. And it is because they have this inalienable right that they are bound by it. It is their government; they have a right to make it as they please, and it is made to protect the rights of the minority. That is the object of a constitution. The very purpose of the instrument is to protect the rights of those who, aside from the constitution, would not have the power to protect themselves, and not to allow their rights to be taken away at the will of the majority. Here is a compact. Under that compact, laws are to be made and administered: under it; not outside of it; not over it; otherwise there would be no safety. We should all live under a despotism if we had not a constitution limiting the powers of Government. If that constitution is a nose of wax in the hands of those who may abolish it when they please, where is liberty at all? It is one of the modes in which the rights of men are perverted when we talk about their right to abolish their form of government. It is a right to abolish forms of government which have been imposed upon them, which are distasteful to them, which they have had no hand in making; but when they have made a constitution, they ought to live under it or change it in the manner in which they have agreed to change it. Such have always been the decisions everywhere, so far as I have known, and I trust they always will be.

I have now stated, Mr. President, in a very desultory and a very imperfect manner, my objections to some features, not to all, of this constitution. These, of themselves, if there were no others, would constitute a conclusive reason why I could never vote for the passage of this bill. I have other reasons, equally satisfactory, equally strong, to my own mind; and I have made some preparation, as I intimated in the early part of my remarks, to be heard on those points at some time before the vote be taken in the Senate. I may forego, or I may avail myself of that opportunity. If it comes to be a question of endurance here, and we are to sit at nights, until the physical power of the one party or the other shall yield, I shall probably, if God spares my life and health, take an opportunity to be heard on certain other questions connected with the admission of Kansas under this constitution; but, not knowing what might befall me before the vote may be taken, I wished to be heard now, even in this very imperfect manner, on these patent objections to the instrument before us, lest by possibility the vote might be taken here, and my voice never be uplifted against this most atrocious, high-handed act of usurpation. Such will be the character of the act when consummated; the consummation will be when we impose this constitution upon the people of Kansas. I say "impose" it upon them, because I take great pleasure in saying that this constitution—obnoxious, outrageous, infamous as it is—was never made, and has never been assented to, by the people of the Territory of Kansas. They loathe it as I do. They scorn its very name. They detest its principles, its details, its origin; and so do I. I should regret that the people of any Territory within the limits of these United States could, of their own free will, come before the Congress of the United States with a constitution of this description, and ask to be admitted as a member of this Confederacy under it. I should regret it, because I should be compelled to believe that a people who really could, in this age of the world, willingly submit to, and sit down under, a constitution like this, were not fit for free government, and ought not to become members, as a State, of the great Confederacy, called the United States of America.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator yield to me the floor for a moment? I desire to move an executive session; but before I do I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow, at half past twelve o'clock, so as to give the fullest time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish to ask if this is done by an interruption of the speaker?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Senator from Missouri has moved to postpone the bill until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow; that is the pending question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is the object to override the morning hour to-morrow? [Yes.] Will the Senator state some reason why he wishes to override the morning hour? There is public business of importance that ought to be considered, and we have no time for it but during the morning hour. I ask the Senator from Missouri to give some reason for his proposition.

Mr. GREEN. I do not desire to make any motion to interfere with the ordinary proceedings of the Senate. I made the motion in order to afford the opponents of the Leecompton constitution the fullest opportunity of debate. If they do not desire it, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until one o'clock. [That will do.] If I understand them they do not wish additional time. [Oh, no.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that his motion is unnecessary if the object is to go into executive session. That motion can be entertained without any proposition for postponement.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, March 8, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM CHAUNCEY LANGDON.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

MEMBER OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina, in lieu of Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, (excused from service,) member of the special committee to which was referred the resolution in reference to the expulsion of Mr. MATTESON.

JOHN HAMILTON.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be on ordering House bill (No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I find, on inquiry this morning, that we have neglected to appoint a committee on rules. I think that, by the amendment of the rules, a little business might be facilitated. I hope that, by general consent, the Speaker will be authorized to appoint a committee on rules, such as we formerly had; and for that purpose I send up a resolution—

Mr. GROW. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules for the purpose I have indicated?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ATKINS. An amendment to this bill, offered on Friday last, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] was adopted, allowing interest to the claimant from the time his claim was perfected, in 1852. I desire now to enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the gentleman how he voted?

Mr. ATKINS. I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STANTON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Buffinton, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Dammell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Pike, Pottle, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, Thayer, Tompkins, Walbridge, Waldron, Israel Washburn, Wood, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Atkins, Billingshurst, Bliss, Bocoek, Bonham, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, George W. Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Leach, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Kelly, Ruffin, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Wade, Waldron, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—89.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Pending the vote,

Mr. OWEN JONES stated that his colleague, Mr. CHAPMAN, was unexpectedly called away from the city on Saturday.

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that Mr. HICKMAN was detained at his rooms by indisposition.

Mr. DAVIDSON made a like statement in reference to Mr. SANDIDGE.

Mr. GREENWOOD made a like statement in reference to Mr. WARREN.

Mr. WORTENDYKE stated that his colleague, Mr. ADRAIN, was detained from the House on account of sickness in his family.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, the bill was ordered to be engrossed; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. STANTON moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LOVEJOY called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clingman, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, James Craig, Curtis, Dammell, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Maynard, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Russell, Savage, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Barksdale, Bocoek, Bonham, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dowdell, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Jackson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Millson, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Reagan, Ruffin, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Stevenson, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Wade, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, and Augustus R. Wright—60.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution which I alluded to a few minutes ago. It is to supply an omission made at the beginning of the session, and which omission I was not aware of till the Committee on Accounts called attention to it. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to revise the rules of the House and recommend such amendments as they may deem necessary to facilitate business, and that they have leave to report at any time.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to suspend the rules.

The rules were not suspended; only sixty-three members—not two thirds of a quorum—voting in favor thereof.

STENOGRAPHER TO JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a resolution which it is important to have acted upon immediately:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to employ a stenographer at the usual rate of compensation, whilst engaged in the examination of witnesses in the investigation of the official conduct of Hon. John C. Watrous, district judge of the eastern district of the State of Texas.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask whether this is in order?

The SPEAKER. It is, if not objected to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it is in order, I do not object; if it is not in order, I do object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to suspend the rules; and I would state to the House that it is utterly impossible for the committee to discharge its duties without the services of a stenographer.

The question was put; and the rules were suspended, two thirds having voted therefor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW JERSEY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present joint resolutions of the State of New Jersey for the purpose of reference.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I think it would be better to go on and call the States for resolutions regularly. I object.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move to suspend the rules. The rules were suspended, two thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Mr. ROBBINS then presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, relative to the erection of public buildings in the city of Trenton by the General Government; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to dropped and retired officers;'" when the Speaker signed the same.

THE BARK ADRIATIC.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolutions:

Whereas, the American bark Adriatic, Captain Dunham master, in the night time, on the 2d day of September, 1856, came in collision with the French steamer Lyonnais, on the high seas, about sixty miles to the north of the Nantucket shoals, on the American coast, by which collision the said French steamer Lyonnais was sunk, and the said steamer and her cargo became a total loss, whilst the said American bark sustained little injury, and continued her voyage to its termination in Massachusetts bay; and whereas, the said American bark, under the same master, some time after the said collision, made a voyage to the port of Marseilles, in France, when the said bark, it is said, was libeled by the owners of the said French steamer Lyonnais, to make her responsible for the damages occasioned by the said collision, on the ground that it was caused by the neglect and want of care of the officers in charge of the said American bark Adriatic; and whereas, it is also stated that the court of the first instance, in France, decided that the said claim for damages was unfounded, and that, upon appeal, the said decision was reversed, and the said American bark Adriatic was condemned, and held to pay the damages occasioned by the said collision, on the ground, as it is reported, that the said American bark was in default because she carried no lights set, whilst the said French steamer had lights set above her deck, so as to show her position and course she was steering; and whereas, by the commercial law of nations, sailing vessels are not required to carry lights set in the night time, on the high seas; and whereas, there is no law of the United States requiring sailing vessels on the high seas to carry lights set in the night time, to show their position and the course they are steering; and whereas, it is believed that the laws of France make it obligatory on sailing vessels belonging to the French merchant marine to carry lights set as aforesaid, in night time, upon the high seas; and whereas the condemnation by a French court, of an American vessel, to pay the damages occasioned by a collision between her and a French steamer on the high seas, and beyond the territorial jurisdiction of France, upon the ground that the American vessel and her officers were in fault, and guilty of negligence and want of care, because there were no lights set on the said vessel, to make her presence known, and show the course she is steering, as required by the laws of France, is a wrong done to the owners of the said American vessel in their capacity of American citizens, and is also an invasion of the sovereignty of the United States, and an infringement of her rights as a member of the great family of nations, inasmuch as it subjects American citizens and American property navigating the high seas, under the exclusive jurisdiction and authority of their own country, to the provisions of the laws of France, which are obligatory only on her own people: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to inquire into and ascertain the facts involved in the said alleged seizure of the said American bark, and the grounds on which the said reported condemnation of the said American bark to pay the said damages was based, and whether there is any law of France requiring sailing vessels on the high seas to carry lights set in the night time.

And be it further resolved, &c., That if it shall appear, upon proper inquiry, that the said condemnation was based upon the ground that the American bark and her officers were guilty of neglect and want of care because there was no light set on the said American bark, as required by the laws of France, then, and in that case, the President of the United States is hereby requested to bring the said fact to the notice of the French Government, with a view to obtain redress for the wrong sustained by American citizens in this instance, and to prevent similar wrongs in the future.

Mr. OLIN. I object to the consideration of the resolutions at this time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to know what disposition the gentleman from Louisiana proposes to make of the resolutions?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I wish to take the sense of the House upon the resolutions at this time, or on some future day.

Mr. OLIN. I have no objection to the resolutions, if the gentleman will move their reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Very well. If the House will receive the resolutions, I will move that reference.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I object.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to inquire whether they are joint resolutions, or simply House resolutions?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. They are joint resolutions.

Mr. MILLSON. I would say to the gentleman from Louisiana, if he will make them mere resolutions, unincumbered with a preamble, I think there will be little or no objection. I think the gentleman will see that some statements in the preamble involve not very clear principles of international law.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana if they are joint resolutions?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. They are.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Louisiana will make them mere resolutions of the House of Representatives, I shall have no objection to them.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I prefer the resolutions as they are. It is a matter of great importance, and if the rules are suspended I will move to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The question was taken, and the rules were suspended.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I prefer to say something on this subject at this time, and if it is in order, I will do so. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. EDIE. That was not the bargain.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. There seems to be a disinclination to have anything said upon the subject at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the resolutions are read a first and second time.

The joint resolutions were read a first and second time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. If it be in order, I desire to say a few words, and a few words only in relation to the resolutions. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is in order.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. The House of Representatives, and indeed Congress, during the present session, have been occupied for a great length of time in relation to matters which are of little public importance. I mean that the time of the House and of the Senate has been taken up in discussion which will probably lead to no practical result. The question now presented is one of great public moment, and it is one that is connected with the great interests of this nation. It is known that these United States of America have become the greatest commercial nation of the world. It is of public importance to all engaged in commerce, it is important to all citizens of the United States, that those who are engaged in that commerce, whether it be as ship-owners or as navigators, should be assured of the position which they occupy. The preamble to the resolutions, which I have had the honor to submit, lays down what I conceive to be a settled principle of law. It is known to all that until the application of steam to ocean navigation, there were very few collisions upon the high seas. While the navigation of the ocean was confined to sailing vessels, vessels going in opposite directions scarcely ever pursued the same route. The result was, that collisions were very unfrequent. But since the application of steam as a motive power, steamers pursue the shortest and most direct track between the port of departure and the port to which they are destined; and, therefore, when there is a favorable wind for sailing vessels coming from the port of the steamer's destination, and bound to the port from which the steamer departed, those vessels going in opposite directions, go upon the same track, and are extremely liable to come into collision with each other. Owing to this fact, two of the greatest commercial nations of the world—England and France—have legislated on the subject. In 1850 or 1851, England enacted a law by which sailing vessels, when in the route of, or approaching a steamer, were bound to show a light, in order that their position might be discovered at a distance. The penalty for not complying with that regulation was a deprivation of the right to recover damages, in the event of the sailing vessel being injured by a collision with a steamer.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana, whether it is his intention to encourage sailing vessels to navigate the high seas in the night time without carrying lights? That seems to be the intention of his resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. No, sir. In 1853 or 1854, an act of Parliament was passed in England, making it obligatory upon sailing vessels to carry lights upon the high seas, in particular situations, when the Admiralty determined that lights on such seas were proper or necessary.

The French Government, I believe, has acted in the same direction. Up to this time the American Congress has not acted upon the subject. The only statute enacted by the American Congress, making it necessary for sailing vessels to carry lights, has reference to the northern lakes. Our vessels now upon the high seas are precisely as they formerly were, under no obligation by the commercial law of nations to show lights. Under the law of nations, in the event of a collision occurring between a steamer and a sailing vessel, or between two sailing vessels, the absence of lights placed in a conspicuous position on either of the vessels has not heretofore, nor can it now, enter as a constituent element in determining whether or not the vessel was in fault.

If, under those circumstances, an American vessel, which is under no obligation, by any law of her own country, to carry a light, fails, in consequence of there being no municipal law requiring it, to carry one in the night time, and comes into collision with a vessel, as the Adriatic came into collision with the Lyonnais—if, I say, when that vessel is found in a French port, it be liable to condemnation, if it be subject to be declared in fault for that failure, and is therefore made responsible for the damages occasioned by such collision, merely because of a failure to comply with the municipal regulation of the empire of France—if, when its owners and its master have violated no law of their own country, and have failed to do no one thing which the commercial law of nations requires, it is to be condemned, according to my opinion the citizens of the United States are subjected to a great wrong. And not only is that so; but the Government of the United States suffers a great wrong, because, if the courts of a foreign country can proceed to condemn American vessels, and make them responsible, because of such a failure, then you subject the commercial marine of the United States, you subject American citizens, to the laws of France upon the high seas, and you destroy the equality of the United States with the other nations of the world. Until the Government of the United States sees fit, in pursuance of what I conceive to be a proper policy, to adopt such a municipal regulation, and makes it the duty of the owners of vessels, and those charged with their navigation, to carry lights, no such obligation exists; and it would be an unwarrantable submission on the part of the Government of the United States to injuries done to her citizens, and to the violation of her rights as a nation, if it were patiently to submit to any such condemnation.

Now, for myself, upon a proper occasion, I shall certainly vote for a statutory provision making it obligatory upon American sailing vessels to carry lights in the night time. Such propositions have heretofore been made and negatived. Such a proposition is embraced in a bill now before the House, and which seems not to be regarded with especial favor by a large portion of our fellow-members. But whether we do or do not hereafter adopt such a rule, until we have adopted it I insist upon it that it is a plain principle of right, that our citizens, when not required by the laws of their own country to do so, are not bound to comply with any such regulation adopted by a foreign country.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if the owners of the Adriatic have ever made any representations to the Government in regard to this matter?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I am not aware that they have; but from a discussion upon the subject which took place a few days since in the Chamber of Commerce of New York, I imagine there has been little opportunity to do so; for we all know from the public newspapers that the Adriatic is at this time probably upon the ocean, a fugitive from the French port.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The reason I asked the question was this: I understand the law as the gentleman does; but I suppose the President of the United States would, through our minister in France, upon such representation, proceed without any resolution of Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. There have been a great many wrongs perpetrated upon the high seas upon our citizens and upon American property, that have even been complained of to the Executive, with respect to which no efficient action has been taken. I, for one, think that the time has arrived when the Representatives of the people should demand that, where public interests are involved, steps calculated to be efficient should be taken; and this is one of those instances, in my opinion. I will not detain the House longer, but move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move the previous question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to yield me the floor for a moment to make a suggestion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will hear the suggestion. My object is to save time.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana if he would not be satisfied with a simple resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to inquire into and ascertain and report the facts connected with the alleged seizure and condemnation of the American bark Adriatic by the authorities of France, together with the law relating thereto? and what steps, if any, ought to be taken by the United States Government in regard to the matter?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The resolutions, as they now stand, will give the committee jurisdiction over the whole subject.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Facts are assumed in the preamble of which we know nothing.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. It is only stated that they are so reported.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the joint resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RITCHIE moved that the vote by which the joint resolutions were so referred be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Houston in the chair.)

Mr. CRAWFORD moved to take up House bill No. 307, to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up.

The bill appropriates, for the purpose of defraying the deficiencies in the appropriations for the paper for the printing, for the printing, and for the binding, engraving, and lithographing, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, the following sums of money, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: to pay for paper, $104,000; to pay for the printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives, during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $57,619 94; to pay for the binding, lithographing, and engraving, ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $179,569 64.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is a bill for the purpose of supplying certain deficiencies that are now due for printing, lithographing, &c. I desire to have read a letter from one of the gentlemen to whom some portion of this money is due; and I would say to the House that this money has been due for some two months and more, and those to whom it is due are suffering exceedingly from its non-payment. I hope, therefore, that the House will take the matter under its consideration, and determine what direction it will give this bill. We owe this money. Those to whom it is due are suffering for it, and there is no question in the world that it ought to be paid. I propose, in order to give gentlemen an opportunity to read the bill and inform themselves in reference to its provisions, that some two or more speeches may be made in committee on the important question of the session, and then I shall ask the committee to rise, that I may offer a resolution in the House to close debate on this bill in five minutes after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall have resumed its consideration.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman to state to the committee, in reference to this bill, that he and I have made a personal examination of the affair, and have been convinced of the correctness of his statement. I also want to suggest to him, that before he takes his seat he shall move that the committee rise, with the understanding that he will offer a resolution to terminate debate at the time he proposes, giving members time to read the bill. I know the fact that the men to whom this money is due are suffering from its not being paid, are paying large interest for money, and are having their bills protested almost every day. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] and myself have taken the trouble to make a personal examination of the matter, and have ascertained the amount due to these gentlemen. I therefore hope that before he takes his seat he will move that the committee rise, with a view of offering a resolution to close debate within the time he proposes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What my friend from Tennessee says in regard to this matter is true. We went out and made a personal examination as to the amount of indebtedness on the part of the Government to these gentlemen. This bill covers the amount that is due to them up to the time the bill was introduced.

I have before me a statement of the Superintendent of Public Printing, in which he says that there is $104,000 due for paper, and $47,619 94 due for printing. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SMITH], who is chairman of the Committee on Printing, and myself, have examined and found that that is so. The bill proposes to appropriate $57,619 94 for printing—$10,000 more than was shown to be due in the statement of the Superintendent of Public Printing, because that statement was made a month ago, and further indebtedness has accrued since.

The next item in the bill is $179,569 64 to pay for the binding, lithographing, and engraving, ordered by the Senate. We have added some fifteen thousand dollars to bring it up to the present time. These gentlemen are pressing us to call upon the House to settle their claims; and so far as I am individually concerned, I am anxious, on account of the solicitude which they manifest, that this bill should be passed. No other interest than that have I in the subject-matter. If, therefore, the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee meet the views of the committee I shall move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the general debate on this bill within two hours after its consideration shall have been resumed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCK. I think it would be best to allow this day to be consumed in speaking; and to-morrow morning, before going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the gentleman can move the resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If it is desirable that this day should be occupied in general debate—

Mr. MORGAN. I see by this bill that it appropriates $340,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. What has become of the $700,000 or $1,000,000 that was to be appropriated in the printing deficiency bill a few days ago?

Mr. CRAWFORD. This $790,000 is the amount estimated to be necessary to complete all the printing, lithographing, &c., ordered by Congress; but as there is some division of opinion in the House in reference to the payment for what work is not yet done, the committee has deemed it proper to report a bill for the amount actually due, and leave the question as to the work not done to the future decision of the House. All acknowledge that we now owe $341,000. We therefore propose to have that sum paid, and let us quarrel over the balance hereafter. This sum is less than the amount proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT.] I hope, therefore, that the House will find no difficulty in having this amount of the public debt settled at as early a day as practicable. I therefore move that the committee do now rise, with a view of introducing a resolution to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. Houston reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 307, to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed; and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move the usual resolution to close debate to-morrow at two o'clock, upon the bill which the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union last had under consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would suggest to my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, that he modify his resolution so as to close debate to-day. There can be no controversy about this bill. It is simply to pay for work that has actually been done, which members have received and sent home to their constituents. The Printer is suffering for want of the means due him, and has been for a long time. I hope the gentleman will move to close debate in half an hour.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, I will modify the resolution so as to close debate in five minutes after the committee shall resume the consideration of the bill. I will then move that the committee rise, with a view of passing this bill, and going again into committee, when we can take up another appropriation bill, and go on with the general debate. I hope the House will aid me in carrying out what I propose.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the House is willing that the bill which was last up in committee shall pass upon five minutes' debate, we may as well discharge the committee at once, and pass the bill. It has been once considered in committee, and it is perfectly competent for us to bring it at once into the House, and pass it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think myself, from what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] and from the general inclination which seems to be manifested to pass the bill, that the course suggested by the gentleman from Alabama is the best one; and, to test the sense of the House upon it, I move, if it is in order, to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I thought it was the understanding, when the committee rose, that the bill was to go over until to-morrow, before it was to be acted upon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask whether the motion I have made is in order?

The SPEAKER. It is, by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was brought before the House for consideration.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the bill be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BURNETT. Is a motion to amend in order to that bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman has not the floor to offer an amendment. I move the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to close with his motion that the bill be engrossed, and read the third time. I then rose and asked whether it was in order to move an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the question of the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Georgia states that he had not relinquished the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, sir, I hope the gentleman from Georgia will yield the floor and allow me to introduce an amendment. I will state that my object is to offer a proviso to this bill, by which we shall suspend the printing of Gilliss's report, Emory's report, and the report on the Pacific railroad surveys.

Mr. RITCHIE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RITCHIE. Then I object to it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not propose to debate this bill.

Mr. RITCHIE. I object to debate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CRAWFORD demanded the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the bill will be voted down. If they will cut off the balance of the appropriation, I am willing to give them this; but not without.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Atkins, Bishop, Bliss, Bocoock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Cox, Cragin; James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Garrett, Giddings, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kelsey, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Russell, Savage, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Underwood, Waldron, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Bingham, Blair, Brayton, Bufington, Burlingame, Burnett, Case, Cobb, Covode, Curtis, Dawes, English, Gilman, Goodwin, Grow, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Palmer, Pendleton, Pike, Potter, Ready, Ricard, Ruffin, Scales, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Tompkins, Wade, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Zolliecoffer—47.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CRAWFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give us a little time to introduce bills and resolutions. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion, and ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the motion was agreed to—yeas 80, nays 58.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Houston in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is a bill which certainly does not require to be read at length; and if I have the consent of the committee, I move to dispense with the first reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk then commenced to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The bill now before the committee, called the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, merely provides for the payment of the salaries of the consuls and those employed by the Government in the diplomatic service abroad; and it embodies nothing but provisions for appropriations according to existing law. It belongs to that class of bills which does not fairly admit of amendment. There is no occasion for me to occupy the time of the committee in debating it, unless objection be raised. And I hope the committee will, at as early a period as convenient, rise and report the bill to the House. I will detain the committee no longer.

Mr. BOCOOCK. I prefer always to address myself to the subject before the House, but I know the difficulty which a gentleman encounters here in obtaining the floor, especially on so important a proposition as the one which I design to discuss. I therefore resolved some days, I may say weeks, ago, to avail myself of some suitable occasion in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to deliver to this committee some views which have presented themselves to my mind in relation to a question which has taken up so much of our time, and which has attracted so much of the public attention.

It was originally my intention, Mr. Chairman, to take but a brief glance, by way of preface and for the purpose of completing the view which it was my purpose to submit, at the original Kansas-Nebraska bill; but a speech delivered by my respected colleague from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MILLSON,] a short time ago, makes it incumbent upon me, in my judgment, to devote a larger portion of my time to a discussion of this preliminary question. I regret this very much; because I know that, in the brief hour allotted to us here, I should scarcely have been able to elaborate and enforce the views which I design to present upon the great and leading question. As the matter now is, I shall be able to touch but briefly the points I expected to make, both in reply to the speech of my colleague, and upon the main question itself.

And I wish to say here, that feeling confident that I shall not be able to get through all I have to say, I hope no gentleman will feel called upon to interrupt me, unless I say something which calls for personal explanation from him, individually.

Allow me one more word, by way of introduction. In what I may say in relation to the speech of my colleague, I desire to reciprocate most cordially the kind and friendly tone in which he expressed himself in relation to his colleagues, with whom he has heretofore differed on this Kansas question. And I am the more anxious to do so, because I know that I have not command of that accurate and precise phraseology which the gentleman himself commands, and which is necessary to give one's precise meaning.

The speech of my friend and colleague, like all his performances, and, perhaps, in a greater degree than any of them heretofore, was able and ingenious. The onward sweep of his logic was as regular and as graceful as the charge of the light brigade at Balaklava; but I say, with all respect, that, in my humble judgment, it led to no more useful or valuable result. What, sir, was the great lesson taught by the speech of my colleague? One might have supposed for a moment that his design was to enforce upon the attention of the House the fact that in accepting the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, the South did not get all to which it was entitled. If I had been satisfied that this was the purpose and intention of my colleague, I should not have felt called upon to reply to it. But in view of the entire speech, and all the circumstances which surrounded it, that supposition cannot be maintained. Then, Mr. Chairman, could it be that my worthy friend and colleague felt himself called upon to expend so much ingenuity and ability, and to give us so fine a display of dialectics, for the purpose of proving that he foresaw all the evils which have occurred in Kansas, and that they are the legitimate and proper results of the Kansas-Nebraska bill? Sir, he who claims for himself the character of a prophet of the past, or a foreteller of woe, seeks a reputation which, in my humble judgment, is by no means desirable. One who felt deeply and thought strongly, and who knew well how to wreak his thought upon expression, has said:

"Of all the horrid, hideous notes of human woe;
Worse than the owl songs or the midnight blast,
Is that portentous phrase 'I told you so!'
Uttered by friends, those prophets of the past,
Who, instead of telling what you now should do,
Own that they thought that you would fall at last,
And solace your slight lapse 'gainst 'bonos mores,'
By a long memorandum of old stories."

A prophet of the past! Why, sir, it can avail but little in this case, at any rate; for if the evils which have occurred in Kansas are to continue; if the strife which has occasionally manifested itself there is to break forth anew and with increased violence, until the roar of battle and the fury of the storm shall fill the land with uproar, it will be but a poor privilege to come upon the stage, like the chorus in the ancient Greek tragedy, and in the lull of the tempest and the pause of the battle to sing a dirge of doom. If, on the contrary, Kansas is speedily to be admitted into the Union, and under the benign and genial influences of State independence and State sovereignty, all these evils are to be first localized, and then banished forever. If "all the clouds that lower o'er our house," are to be "in the deep bosom of the ocean buried," then, in the panorama of contentment and prosperity which will follow, there will be no place for this wail of woe. The memory of Cassandra has but the greenness of the lichens and ivy that cover the ruins of Troy. It is mingled in the memory with the recollection of a falling city and a scattered people. Had Troy not fallen, it would long ago have perished like

"The fat weed that rots on Lethe's wharf."

I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to notice particularly, but briefly, the leading points made by my colleague in his speech against the original Kansas-Nebraska bill. They appear to me to have been twofold. He objected to it upon the ground that in its legal and necessary construction, it sustained the idea of territorial sovereignty; and he also objected to it on the ground that it contained what is called the Badger proviso. Permit me to consider those objections seriatim.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say here, in the commencement of the remarks that I shall make upon this question of territorial sovereignty, that if that bill, in its legitimate and necessary construction, did tolerate the idea of territorial sovereignty, I should prefer it, both being constitutional, to the doctrine of congressional restriction; for under congressional restriction, if you have peace it will be the peace of admitted inferiority of rights on the one side, and admitted superiority of rights on the other. Under the doctrine of territorial sovereignty you might have strife and conflict; you would probably have a struggle among men of clashing interests and conflicting views to gain the ascendancy; but poor as it would be, we would still have our chance, and we would have the consolation, at any rate, to know, if the question were decided against us, it would be decided by those who were to be most interested in the question at issue.

But, sir, I contend that the legitimate and necessary construction of that act does not sustain the idea of territorial sovereignty. The clause to which my colleague alludes is this:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Now, it will be remembered that my colleague ridiculed the idea that the Congress of the United States intended gravely to abrogate the power to prohibit slavery in States of the Union already existing; but whatever this provision does not mean, it certainly does mean to do that. That is precisely what it does mean, most emphatically. No other construction can be given to it; and, perhaps, the reason for inserting such a provision in the bill was, that in the restriction of 1820 the power was clearly and distinctly assumed by the Congress of the United States to prohibit slavery in the States. Here is that restriction:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of 36° 30' north latitude, not included within the limits of the State contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby, forever prohibited."

And in the joint resolution for the annexation of Texas to the United States, we find this more distinct and emphatic clause:

"And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited."

There is the power distinctly claimed; and in the Kansas and Nebraska bill it is distinctly surrendered. I do not contend that the Constitution afforded any pretext for such an assertion of power. Far from it. The claim had been made, however, and the surrender should follow.

But the gentleman says that the insertion of the words "Territory or," before the word "State," makes that clause applicable to Territories in their territorial condition, as well as to States; and that the necessary construction of it is, that the people of Territories, as such, shall be left free to regulate their domestic affairs, including the subject of slavery, in their own way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not contend—I would not be guilty of the want of candor to contend—that the language is not susceptible by possibility of such a construction. What I contend for is, that it is not the necessary construction of the clause. Now, sir, you will bear in mind, that the Territories of the United States often act in a somewhat anomalous manner. Consider, if you please, the case of the Territories of Florida, of Michigan, and of Iowa. You will bear in mind that, without any enabling act, without any authority whatsoever from the Congress of the United States, those Territories proceeded to form State constitutions, and presented them here, asking admission into the Union. What was their condition then? I admit the doctrine that this was a sort of declaration of independence on the part of these Territories, and that their subsequent admission into the Union was an acknowledgment of that independence. Congress was not bound to admit them, however; and if it had not, they would have remained in a territorial condition. Their status was then subject to the action of Congress. It might have been, then, in reference to this anomalous, or, if I may so express it, hermaphrodite condition, that the words "Territory or State" were used.

Now, sir, I submit that if the phraseology employed was applicable to the Territories in their territorial condition, the grant was made "subject to the Constitution of the United States." This proviso followed the grant, and controlled it. Whatever power we constitutionally had we gave up, and no more. The gentleman says that the Congress of the United States ought to interpret the Constitution for itself, and in passing a law should look to the constitutional limits and not surpass them. I admit, that when the Congress of the United States proposes to pass an ordinary act that is to be a rule of conduct for individuals, it ought to determine for itself, as far as it can, whether it be constitutional or unconstitutional; but this was no such act: this, following the manner of a deed, was a grant of power from the Federal Government to the Territorial Legislature; all that was done was to say, whatever power we have in relation to this subject, we surrender it to the Territorial Legislature. I contend, sir, that however the words "Territory or State" be construed, we were not called upon to give an unconstitutional vote, for the limitation followed the grant wherever it went. As is frequently done in deeds from one man to another, we conveyed whatever power we had, subject to adjudication.

I submit now, whether we were not right in our action? The question of territorial sovereignty being a matter in dispute between northern and southern Democrats, then if we had required it to be adjudicated by Congress, it would have resulted that while we were wrangling upon this question, the opportunity to carry the more important point of repealing the Missouri restriction, would have been lost, perhaps irretrievably.

Now, sir, comes in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to determine the question. It says that this doctrine of territorial sovereignty has no countenance in the Constitution; and whatever evils my colleague may think arose before that time, from the doubt which existed on the subject, or whatever evils he might have apprehended from this cause, afterwards, from the time of the decision of the Supreme Court in regard to this case, the doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska bill stood vindicated and redeemed from all suspicion or taint of encouraging territorial sovereignty. And I would say to my colleague that perhaps others may have foreseen the decision of the Supreme Court as well as himself. Since that decision, all his fears and all his troubles on this subject may be forever quieted.

I shall consider now, for a few brief moments, the other objection of my colleague. It is the objection to what is called the Badger proviso; and permit me to say here, Mr. Chairman, that when that proviso was introduced in the other wing of the Capitol, by the distinguished Senator whose name it bears, I regretted it. I regretted it because I thought it was a concession, in form at least, from the weaker and oppressed interest in the land, and that which had been so long suffering under the injustice of this Missouri restriction, to the stronger and aggressing interest. But I did not attribute to it that importance which my colleague does; and I desire to examine for a while into its true meaning and effect. What is that proviso? This is its language:

"Nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive or put in force any law or regulation that may have existed prior to the act of March, 1820, either protecting, establishing, prohibiting, or abolishing slavery."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to consider that proviso in two points of view. The Missouri restriction, which the act of 1854 was intended to repeal, was constitutional or it was unconstitutional. I wish to look at it under both these suppositions. Suppose, now, that the Missouri restriction of 1820 was constitutional, what did it do? Why, sir, there were some old French or Spanish laws, recognizing slavery, which existed in the Territory of Louisiana when it was acquired from France, and which were, by tolerance, continued in existence. Here comes then the restriction of 1820, and, by implication, suspends these old laws, and makes the ground an open field; and after making it an open field, it next advances and takes possession of the field, and erects on it a barrier, a positive prohibition against the introduction of the peculiar property of the South. The effect of the restriction then was twofold. Now, by the repeal of the restriction by the act of 1854, what did we do, in that supposition? We, at least, removed the positive prohibition, and left again the open field of which I have spoken. In that supposition, did we not gain something?

Well, take the other supposition! Say, now, that the restriction of 1820 was unconstitutional! What, then, was the consequence of the restriction? Then it was null and void ab initio. It had no effect or force whatever. It did not repeal the old French or Spanish laws. They were not, in legal contemplation, suspended. Well, sir, what does this Badger proviso say? It says, "nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive or put in force," &c. But these laws did not require to be revived by that act of 1854. They were in existence aleunde—not by virtue of the act of 1854, but by virtue of their previous existence never having been suspended. The proviso says that the act of 1854 shall not put them in force. It does not say that they shall not be in force. I could enlarge on this idea, which I consider strictly legal and tenable; but I prefer, in the little time allowed me, not to dwell longer on this point. I wish to rise to a higher and more comprehensive, and, in my opinion, a more statesmanlike conception of this entire question. What is it, sir? Here, Mr. Chairman, had been a conflict in the land as to the question whether the Constitution of the United States, proprio vigore, extended or did not extend to the Territories of the United States.

The mighty intellects of Calhoun and Webster had met in stern conflict on this question on the floor of the Senate Chamber, and their followers throughout the country had ranged themselves on the one side and on the other. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but there was also a contest whether this Government of the United States should be allowed to exert its power to discourage and limit the property of one section of the Union, and to extend and enlarge the property of the other section. The Kansas-Nebraska bill of 1854 comes in and decides both these questions. It declares the Constitution of the United States expressly extended to these Territories; and it further declares that the Government of the United States shall not exert its power or authority to limit or restrain the property of one portion of the Union, and to stimulate and encourage the interest of the other portion.

Here, then, we have the Government of the United States surrendering its authority over this question and expressly declaring the Constitution of the United States extended to these Territories. Then comes the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, declaring that the Constitution, so operating in the Territories, shall stand as a tower of strength and a monument of defense for the property and interests of all sections of the Union—of the one section as well as the other. What now do you want with your wicker-work of Spanish and French laws? You have in the place of them the supreme power, the mighty influence, the permanent protection of the Constitution of the United States—the highest American law. You have in that a shield stronger than the shield of Achilles. You have a tower of strength more impregnable than twenty Cronstads. And still you talk about your French and Spanish laws! This, sir, was a great era in the history of American legislation. It was the era of an abdication, of a surrender of usurped power on the part of the Congress of the United States, and of a restoration of the Constitution to its true control and supremacy. It is an abdication and restoration more important, and grander in every point of view, than any abdication or restoration of "prince, potentate, or power," recorded in the history of the world. The Congress of the United States gives up its usurped power to limit the property of the South. The Constitution of the United States is restored to its former rule. And while all are rejoicing at this great era in American legislation, at this great abdication and restoration, my colleague chooses to stand by and complain that the usurper, in going out, takes with him a little of the dirty linen of the establishment.

But, sir, I wish to look at this subject as a subject of prophecy. There were more predictions made than one. There were more prophets than my colleague in the land at that time. The nation was then rather plethoric of prophets. It was declared, on the other hand, that if we did loose these French or Spanish laws, our property would enjoy the protection of the Constitution, and also such protection as might be given by the Territorial Legislature. And did we not have it? Herein was prophecy fulfilled. My colleague seems to think that the evils that have arisen in Kansas were the necessary and the logical results of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Now, sir, I submit to him, whether, if they are the natural and legitimate results of the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the same consequences would not follow wherever the cause exists? But, sir, the principles of the Kansas and Nebraska bill were applied to the Territory of Nebraska; they have been applied also, in effect, to New Mexico; and why have not the same evils resulted there, if they follow necessarily from the principles of that bill?

If the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill had been adopted long years ago, before the public mind had become so distempered and diseased, no trouble would have followed; but, in my judgment, everything would have gone off smoothly and quietly under them. The settlement of Kansas would have been left to the ordinary laws of settlement; men would have gone there from the ordinary causes, to select their homes and work out their fortunes; all would have gone off well. It was because the public mind had become distempered and diseased; it was because the wranglings here on the floors of Congress had produced such heart-burnings and bad feelings between the two sections of the country, that these results followed. The extraordinary means adopted to settle Kansas; your emigrant aid associations, and the characters of the men whom they sent there; your Jim Lanes, and your Sharpe's rifles; these must bear the blame for the troubles which have arisen in Kansas.

Mr. Chairman, these evils are upon us, and it is proposed to settle them by the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State. The President of the United States has sent a message to the Congress of the United States, communicating to us the constitution adopted at Lecompton, and recommending that Kansas shall be admitted into the Union as a State under that constitution. I stand here to-day to take my position in favor of such admission, and I shall now proceed to give the reasons upon which I base my action.

Now, sir, I am free to admit that when this constitution comes to us we have the right to inquire, first, whether there is a sufficient population in Kansas to entitle her to come into the Union as a State. Well, sir, I believe there is no difference of opinion upon that subject. All parties are agreed upon that point. The Topeka men seem to have acted all along upon the supposition that there was population enough there to justify a State constitution. The Lecompton men have done the same, and those who sustained the measure proposed by the distinguished Senator from Georgia, during the last Congress, seem never to have objected on that ground.

Then, sir, I admit that you have the right to inquire whether the form of Government proposed is republican. I believe there is no difficulty upon that subject. All are agreed upon that point.

There is another and very important inquiry which we have a right to make. We have the right to inquire whether the constitution sent here is in fact the constitution of the State of Kansas or not; and it is to that point that I propose now to direct my remarks.

Now, sir, I wish to say in the beginning, that I design to argue this point with all fairness and candor if I can. I shall make certainly very liberal admissions to the gentlemen on the other side. I admit that all republican constitutions "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." I admit the doctrines that "sovereignty makes constitutions;" that "sovereignty rests exclusively with the people of each State;" that "sovereignty cannot be delegated;" that it is "inalienable, indivisible," &c. I also admit fully the doctrines of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, that the people, when they come to form their constitution, should be left free to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way.

Now, sir, if I can maintain the propriety of the admission of Kansas into the Union upon those principles, gentlemen ought to acquiesce; if not, I lose my proposition, and I fail in the effort I am here to make.

In the first place, then, I admit that governments instituted among men derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. That is the first admission. But I deny that it is a necessary corollary from this principle that the constitution of a State shall be submitted to the votes of all the governed. On the contrary, no constitution that was ever framed, either in this or any other country, was ever submitted to the vote of all the people who were to be governed by it. How many of the States of this Union allow the African race to vote? I think New England and New York alone aspire to that "bad eminence." Yet the African race are among the governed. How many States in this Union allow a citizen just landed upon its soil from any other State, or from a foreign country, to vote? Not one, I believe. In most of the States in the Union, they require a man to have resided in the State for twelve months, even if a citizen of the United States, before he is allowed to vote. And yet, sir, they are among the governed. How many of the States of this Union allow females and children to vote? Not one; and yet, are they not in the list of the governed? Then it is a clear proposition, that the fact that a form of government derives its powers from the consent of the governed, does not require the constitution to be submitted to all who are to be governed under it. I will show, in the sequel, that the consent of the governed is given on the representative principle.

The next concession which I make is to be found in a certain letter written by the late Governor of Kansas, upon the occasion of his resignation of office. He says that—

"Sovereignty makes constitutions; that sovereignty rests exclusively with the people of each State; that sovereignty cannot be delegated; that it is inalienable, indivisible, a unit incapable of partition."

Now, sir, I admit all that; but I will not concede for a moment, because sovereignty is inalienable, that acts of sovereignty cannot be exercised through some medium, organism, or representative agency; far from it. I think that the celebrated letter to which I refer affords a remarkable instance of how a really able man, when sustaining a heresy, may entangle and overthrow himself in the mazes of his own metaphysics. Robert J. Walker declares:

"It will not be denied that sovereignty is the only power that can make a State constitution, and that it rests exclusively with the people; and if it is inalienable, and cannot be delegated, as I have shown, then it can only be exercised by the people themselves."

And again, in reference to the Constitution of the United States, he says:

"Each State acted for itself alone in acceding to the Articles of Confederation in 1778, and each State acted for itself alone in framing and ratifying, each for itself, the Constitution of the United States. Sovereignty, then, with us, rests exclusively with the people of each State."

Here, sir, he assumes that each State adopted the Constitution of the United States for itself, and that the Constitution of the United States, being so adopted, has become the constitution of each particular State. Yet he seems not to have borne in mind that that very fact upsets his whole theory. Sir, the Constitution of the United States is not to-day binding in the State of Virginia, or in any other State of this Union, or else the doctrine is erroneous that it requires the people in their primary capacity to ratify it. Why, sir, the Constitution of the United States was framed by a convention and ratified by conventions and Legislatures in the several States; not in any one case was it referred to a direct vote of what Mr. Walker calls the sovereign people.

Sir, to declare war and to make peace—are they not acts of sovereignty? And are they not done by representative agencies? Why may not a constitution be formed in like manner? Mr. Chairman, a great deal of confusion exists in the public mind in relation to the question, who are the people in whom the sovereignty resides? I accord with the doctrine of Robert J. Walker, and say it resides in the masses. Every man and every citizen who has rights and power in the community is a part of the sovereign mass. All of the citizens together constitute the original fountain and source of all power in a community. They are the sovereignty. Now, sir, if sovereignty is a unit and indivisible, the whole sovereign mass must act together. If one citizen be wanting, the unity is broken and the sovereignty destroyed. It is clear, then, that if sovereignty resides in the mass, and is indivisible, it cannot be carried out into acts without a medium, an organism, or a representative agency, as the free mind cannot act except through the agency of the body. This results from the fact that it is impossible ever to get all the citizens together in consensaneous action. If this sovereignty is a unit, can a majority exercise that sovereignty? Those who do not act with the majority have a part of the sovereignty in themselves, and their dissent breaks the unity.

I wish now to inquire upon what principle the majority acts for a community, and what results from that fact? I say that the majority does not act for the community upon any principle of natural right. Let us suppose that the whole framework of Government could by some mighty convulsion be struck from existence in any State of the Union: what would follow? A primary meeting of the people would be held, to put into operation some rude structure of government. Would all the people assemble? By no means. That is always impossible. A great many would stay away, and those who stayed away would have a part of the sovereignty in themselves. But according to the principle declared by Governor Walker, those who came would be the representatives of those who stayed away. Each man who should attend the primary meeting would represent his absent neighbor and family; and, upon the principle of representation, that primary meeting could act for the whole. If the community left without government should consist of one hundred thousand people, not more than eighty thousand could assemble in primary meeting. How would they act? The eighty thousand would not agree upon all questions, or perhaps upon any question; and from necessity, a majority would control their decisions, unless a different rule were agreed on. Then forty-one thousand, being the majority of the eighty thousand, would speak for the whole community. Upon what principle of natural right or undivided sovereignty, I ask, can forty-one thousand declare the opinion of one hundred thousand? Again, take the case of the voters of a community. Upon what principle do they act for the whole? Are they the sovereign mass? No, sir, by no means. Take the case of Kansas itself; and allowing that there are one hundred thousand people in that territory, then say that the constitution is to be submitted to the voters. According to statistics, the number of votes would be about one fifth of the entire mass. Take the census of 1840 or 1850, and then the vote at the intervening and succeeding presidential election, and you will find that the votes are rarely, if ever, more than one fifth of the entire number of the people. Then if there were one hundred thousand people in Kansas, the number of voters might have been as high as twenty thousand. Of that twenty thousand, a majority would control, and eleven thousand would constitute that majority. Now, I ask, upon what principle of natural right, or of indivisible sovereignty, can eleven thousand voters declare the voice of one hundred thousand people? They are the organism or representative agency merely, through which the whole body speaks, just as a convention is the mouth-piece of the people.

Chief Justice Taney, in giving the opinion of the court in the Dred Scott case, says:

"Undoubtedly, a person may be a citizen—that is a member of the community who form the sovereignty—although he exercises no share of the political power, and is incapacitated from holding particular offices. Women and minors, who form a part of the political family, cannot vote; and when a property qualification is required to vote or hold a particular office, those who have not the necessary qualifications cannot vote or hold the office, yet they are citizens."

There are a number of the citizens in every community who constitute a part of the body politic, who have a portion of the sovereignty in themselves, but who are not allowed to vote. The voters, then, only represent the people. They are not, in fact, the sovereign people. So I show the universality of the representative principle. A primary meeting, as usually constituted, is a representative agency. A convention is a representative agency. The voters are a representative agency, and any question between them is a question between different representative agencies. Each one speaks the voice of the people in its sphere, just as the agent when acting within his power speaks the voice of his principal. Talk about appealing from the convention to the sovereign people! I say, if you appeal to the voters, you only appeal from one representation to another representation. Perhaps broader, perhaps better, but still a representative agency. You deny the voice of one organism through which the people speak, and take the voice of another organism. When there is no law to determine who shall declare the voice of the people, the people are a law unto themselves, and necessity and circumstances determine. When you have an organized society, the law declares who shall speak for the people in each particular case.

Now, apply these principles to the case of Kansas. Who was authorized to speak the voice of the people of Kansas in relation to the constitution? The convention, and the convention only. Sir, the convention was the organism through which sovereignty spoke. Its voice was the voice of the people. The Constitution of the United States, framed, as I have said, by a convention, and ratified in each State by a convention, nevertheless announces itself as the act of the people. In its preamble it says: "We, the people of the United States, &c., &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution." So in Kansas, the convention was merely the mouth through which the people were presumed in law to speak. The constitution adopted by them was, therefore, the act of the people. You may think that another agency would have been better, but you cannot properly interfere, for this is that which was spoken when we said that we would "leave the people thereof (of Kansas) perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way."

I have not undertaken to inquire whether the Legislature which called this convention was a legally-authorized Legislature. I do not think it necessary to stop to argue that question. I do not believe any lawyer in this House will, upon legal principles, deny the proposition. Though the first Legislature may have been elected originally by fraud, it was the government de facto, and was never set aside by any competent authority. We are bound to recognize its acts. The whole jurisprudence of Kansas rests upon the legality of the two last Legislatures—the one of which took the sense of the people whether there should be a convention, and the other of which passed the law calling the convention. Mr. Walker himself told them that all the usages and rights of the people of Kansas hung upon the legality of the Legislature of Kansas. He says:

"If that Legislature was invalid, then we are without law or order in Kansas—without town, city, or county organization; all legal and judicial transactions are void; all titles null, and anarchy reigns throughout our borders."

Permit me to illustrate this matter. You remember that a great complaint was made in regard to an election in a sister State not long ago. I am not here, upon this occasion, to decide whether those complaints were well or ill-founded. I can make any supposition I please by way of analogy. Let me say, then, for the sake of the argument, that the vote in the city of Baltimore was illegal, and that the vote of that city controlled the gubernatorial election, and the election of members of the Legislature enough to control the complexion of that body. Will gentlemen say that because that is so, the present Legislature of Maryland has no authority in the State, and that its acts are null and void? That body is the Legislature of Maryland. The Legislature which has the forms is the Legislature which has the power.

So it is in Kansas. Its Legislature passed a law which is admitted on all sides to be a fair law, for the assembling of a convention. Gentlemen contend that there has been a radical defect in the manner in which this law was carried out. Why, Mr. Chairman, I think that objection has already been very fully answered, and I shall occupy but little time upon it. It is a legal principle in law, which all these gentlemen around me understand, that nobody can take advantage of his own wrong, or of his own laches. If the law passed by the Legislature of Kansas for the assembling of that convention had not enabled them to have had a fair election, by which they could send up delegates who reflected the voice of the people, I say there might be something in the objection. But the law was sufficient. It was the fault of the people themselves if they were excluded; and that I will prove by the record. I say, if the people themselves had a chance to be represented in the convention, and would not be represented, it is too late for them to come now and complain; they cannot take advantage of their own laches. Here is what Mr. Stanton said in his message to the Legislature of Kansas at its called session on the 8th of December, 1857:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people, in nineteen counties of the Territory; while, in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some there was but a small population, and no efficient organization enabling the people to have a representation in the convention."

He declares here that the "people and officers were, in some cases, alike averse to the proceeding;" yet these people, or their friends, now complain.

But Mr. Stanton gives a fuller explanation of this matter in a speech recently delivered in New York. There he says:

"Well, now, gentlemen, shortly after I arrived in the Territory the process of taking the census was completed, and the returns were made by the sheriffs of the different counties to the probate judges of those counties, in order that the census returns might be corrected. That law which had been passed at the previous session of the Legislature of the Territory had provided that every voter in the Territory should be registered, and no man should be entitled to vote for delegates to the convention unless he was registered. Going through the Territory, I heard, on all sides, charges of great wrong and injustice; I heard the great mass of the people proclaiming that the officers of the Territory had utterly disregarded right and justice in the performance of this duty; in fact, they had not performed the duty at all. They said in many instances men of high character, residents of long standing, men whose residence could not possibly have been unknown to the officers, had been left off the register. I said to them, Gentlemen, you might have gone to the probate judges, and had those names put on the lists. But they said it was not their duty to go, it was the duty of the officers to register their names. Now it is useless for any of us to disguise the truth. The great mass of the free State people didn't care a fig whether their names were registered or not. They were opposed to the convention; they were opposed to all the laws, and all the proceedings under it."

The law ordered the sheriff in the month of March to make a census and registry, but to provide against any defect in the action of the sheriff it directs that the probate judges should afterwards sit and hear applications for a correction of the sheriffs' lists. Mr. Stanton, it appears, advised those that complained to go to these probate judges, but they refused, saying it was not their duty to go. If they might have gone and done themselves justice and refused to do it, I say it is altogether too late for them to come now and complain. But, sir, this is a most mysterious subject; there is much mist and confusion about it. Mr. Stanton says the number of counties deprived of representation in the convention was nineteen, while Governor Walker says there were fifteen. But look, if you please, and see what those gentlemen thought of it before the late singular turn in their political fortunes. Remember that this act for the taking of the census was passed long before Mr. Walker was appointed Governor of Kansas. The census was to be taken between the first and last of March; the probate judges were to sit from the 10th of April till the 1st of May; to make corrections in the sheriffs' lists, and the election was to take place in June. Now, Mr. Walker reached Leecompton on the 25th of May. At that time the whole matter was completed, and if there had been wrong done, it had been done before that, and he should have known it. Mr. Stanton was his avant courier—the John that went before to make his path straight. He had been in the Territory a considerable time, and according to his own account had received information on this subject, and doubtless communicated it. It cannot be presumed that Governor Walker failed to confer freely with him. What did he say on the 27th of May, in his inaugural, about the people being excluded from voting, and counties being disfranchised? Did he say, then, that there was any cause in existence that would prevent the people from voting for representatives in the convention? Here is what he said:

"I see in this act calling the convention no improper or unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of suffrage. I see in it no test oath or other similar provisions objected to in relation to previous laws, but clearly repealed, as repugnant to the provisions of this act, so far as regards the election of delegates to this convention. It is said that a fair and full vote will not be taken. Who can safely predict such a result? Nor is it just for a majority, as they allege, to throw the power into the hands of a minority, from a mere apprehension (I trust entirely unfounded) that they will not be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage."

He believed then, it appears, that there might be a full and fair vote, and urged the people to make the experiment. Then, sir, on the 27th of May, long after these errors were committed, (if they were committed at all,) Mr. Walker believed that no cause existed which should prevent a fair and full vote, according to his own inaugural. I say, then, that the legality of the Legislature is to be considered incontestable; and the law passed by that body for a convention being a fair law, under which no man was prevented from voting except by his own fault or neglect, and the voters having previously ordered a convention, that convention is a fair mouth-piece for the people in its own proper sphere. What was that sphere? It was to make and proclaim a constitution. So I think the law of its formation shows. It was the mouth-piece of the people in this respect, and the people spoke through it. It had the right, so far as Kansas was concerned, to proclaim the constitution, and did proclaim the constitution. I have seen it argued that they had the right to proclaim the constitution, but chose to submit it, and did not submit it fairly for ratification. Though I have seen great names vouching for this idea, though I have seen it held forth from the capitols of States and from the Capitol of this Union, yet, in my humble judgment, it hardly rises to the dignity of special pleading. It seems rather to be the merest quibble, sir. Did not the convention proclaim the constitution? Did they not say in the seventh section of their schedule: "This constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next ensuing session?" Were there any terms or conditions on which the constitution was not to come here for acceptance? None whatever. That was a certain and fixed fact, with which nothing should interfere. The constitution, then, so far as Kansas was concerned, was a thing accomplished, except as to one single clause upon which a vote was to be taken. When they talk about submitting it for ratification or rejection, they always say, by way of qualification, "as follows," or "in the following manner or form," &c., under which phrase the extent of submission is always explained. They may not have used the most elegant phraseology; they may not have used the language best adapted to convey their ideas; but to say, because of this awkward phraseology, that they did not proclaim the constitution, but did actually submit it, seems to resemble very much the course of the young practitioner at the bar who demurs to a declaration on the ground that some word is spelt badly or that some phrase is ungrammatical. It is what is sometimes called pettifoggery. The constitution being proclaimed, it was to be considered the act of the State of Kansas, and could not afterwards be affected by the action of the voters of the Territory; because you are to consider the thing in the relation in which it will stand when the constitution is admitted. The act of admission will relate back and raise the act of adoption to the dignity of sovereignty. It is to be considered as having been a State at that time. This is always the operation of the act of admission. Congress can only admit States, not Territories. States only can form constitutions, not Territories. The Territory declares its independence and asserts its sovereignty as a State, and Congress, by admission, recognizes its claim. This is the mode in which many, if not all, the new States have come into the Union. If, then, you would try the question whether this is the constitution of Kansas or not, you must try it by legal testimony as you would try the question as a juror whether a prisoner were guilty or not guilty. If the legal testimony acquitted, and you from some hearsay rumors should find the accused guilty, you would commit a great outrage. So here; if the legal evidence, which is the voice of the people speaking through the convention, says that this is the constitution of Kansas, you have no right to look elsewhere for proof. All else is illegal testimony. The voters are not authorized to annul the former action of the people in this particular.

Gentlemen may say that this is a legal and technical view of the question. All I have to say about that is, that if we have the law upon our side, how can the other side come and ask for equity? He who asks equity must do equity. He who comes into court in such a capacity must come with clean hands. In what condition do the Topekaites come before us to make complaint? The last President, the present President of the United States, Governor Walker himself, all have said that these men come not with clean hands. It is proclaimed on all sides that they were combining and consorting together to overthrow the existing government; that they were guilty of moral treason, of sedition, of everything except actual treason; and for them to come now and ask equity against those who have the law upon their side, is, it seems to me, making a most unheard of demand. When an alien comes here, you do not allow him to vote till he has renounced his allegiance to his own Government, and proclaimed his allegiance to this, because you have not evidence of his attachment to this Government. We require a citizen of another State to remain some time in our own State, in order to give evidence of attachment to our institutions. These men have heretofore not only given no evidence of attachment to the institutions of Kansas, but every evidence of malignant hate. Let Governor Walker tell their spirit and temper. In his proclamation to the people of Lawrence, he says:

"Permit me to call your attention, as still claiming to be citizens of the United States, to the results of your revolutionary proceedings. You are inaugurating rebellion and revolution; you are disregarding the laws of Congress and of the territorial government, and defying their authority; you are conspiring to overthrow the Government of the United States in this Territory. Your purpose, if carried into effect in the mode designated by you, by putting your laws forcibly into execution, would involve you in the guilt and crime of treason. You stand now, fellow-citizens, upon the brink of an awful precipice, and it becomes my duty to warn you ere you take the fatal leap into the gulf below. If your proceedings are not arrested, you will necessarily destroy the peace of this Territory, and involve it in all the horrors of civil war. I warn you, then, before it is too late, to recede from the perilous position in which you now stand."

And these are the men who ask for a relaxation of law in their behalf!

I intended to have said a few words further in reference to this point, but I have not time. I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the Hall, who have sought to establish the Topeka constitution, and who, nevertheless, come here and complain of irregularity—I want to say to those who talk about subverting the will of the people and popular sovereignty, and who, at the same time, boldly declare that if every man, woman, and child within the limits of Kansas were to ask for a slave-protecting constitution, they would not allow it—I want to say to them: “Oh, for a forty-parson power to chant your praise, hypocrisy!” I make no appeal to them. But there are gentlemen on this side of the Hall, Mr. Chairman, who do imagine, at least, that they follow their doctrines to their logical and natural results in opposing the admission of Kansas. There are men who do believe that the principles of popular sovereignty lead to this conclusion. To them I appeal. Think again, and trust your friends a little more. A more patient and confiding examination may yet show, that by logical and fair deduction, that doctrine leads to the conclusions which I have spoken.

I have seen in reference to some of them, and particularly to a distinguished gentleman in the other wing of the Capitol, that he has left the standard under which he so long fought; has parted from friends whom he has proved and found faithful; and has turned away to join the ranks of his life-long enemies. It is true, too, that he carries many with him. When the archangel rebelled in heaven, he carried a tenth part of the heavenly hosts with him. If the gentleman continues in his defection, he can find neither his interest nor his pleasure in the bosom of his new allies. He cannot in his heart approve their principles or purposes. They have too many of their own, older, and more tried leaders, to reward, to do ought for him. They have on their bodies too many scars inflicted by his stalwart arm to love him overmuch. If it is not yet too late for him to hearken to the voice of one whom he knows to have been for long years, and truly, his friend, I would call upon him to come back and take his position again in the ranks of that party whose triumphs and whose successes have been the dream of his boyhood and the glory of his manhood. I know that that would require some sacrifice of personal feeling. A great man can make that sacrifice; a little man cannot. Convince a small man, and he hates you forever. A great man sees the error of his ways, and retraces his steps. He will have the consolation of restoring harmony to the only national party left in the land; and what is higher, and holier, and better, he may restore peace to a torn, an exasperated, and an endangered country. Stern truth requires me to say that, whether he returns or does not return; let whoever may choose turn against us or turn for us—our course is onward. If, as I trust, it is onward to victory, then whoever may throw himself in our path will be but crushed beneath the wheels of our conquering chariot. But whether the course of the Democratic party is onward to victory or to defeat, still for us of the South there is no retreat. We are the weaker and the endangered section. We cannot yield our ground. The stronger may, and yet be strong and mighty, and greatly preponderant. We strike for safety and self-protection: they for accumulated power. I do not know what will be the effect of a refusal to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. I am not authorized to speak the views of Virginia. She has not spoken for herself. But I will say this: that, in my judgment, wherever a true and enlightened view of her own honor leads, there she will go; and when she speaks, there is not a true son of hers in all the land, wherever he may be, who will not follow her command. And this, too, I will say: that, although hand join in hand to prevent, the destiny of Virginia, for once and for all, for now and forever, is indissolubly united with that of her sister States of the South.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, the increase of population has been so rapid in the Territories of the United States, that in three out of the seven now organized, constitutions have already been framed with a view to their admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the other States of the Confederacy. The President, in the discharge of the obligation which the Constitution imposes upon him to recommend for our consideration such measures as he may judge necessary and expedient has not found it in the line of that duty to urge upon us any special reasons why more than one of these should be admitted, and that the Territory of Kansas, under and subject to the Lecompton constitution. He has seen fit to accompany this recommendation with an elaborate argument, which, if it has failed to convince the American people of the soundness and justice of the positions assumed, or of the allegations made, has nevertheless left them in no doubt as to what has been the origin, and what are to be the consequences of that policy which makes this Territory and the Lecompton constitution the peculiar objects of a solicitude not shared in by any other Territory, or any other constitution framed within its limits.

I desire to call attention at this time, as briefly as may be, to two points only, to the consideration of which the late special message of the President challenges our attention. The one is a question of law, the other a question of fact:

1. Does the Lecompton constitution come here clothed with the authority of law?
2. Does it come here as the choice of the people to be affected by it?

I propose, at this time, to argue the first of these questions as one of pure law; and, therefore, for the sake of the argument and for the present, to yield all questions of fact; and to say that, if we admit the entire absence of fraud in the creation of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, still the Lecompton constitution comes here without the slightest authority of law, and has no higher sanction or just claim than merely the expressed wish of those who framed and sent it here. A reference to the message will show that the President has made his whole argument to rest and turn upon what he calls the legality of the Lecompton convention, and its work—the Lecompton constitution. He puts aside all other agency than that of the law, and in this matter knows no people outside of this legal channel. He declares that a great portion of the people of Kansas have, for a long time, been in open rebellion against the Government under which they live; that nothing but military force has kept it down and prevented its assuming and discharging the functions of government. This rebellion, he says, has taken on the form of the Topeka constitution, and has assumed a revolutionary type. Over against these the President sets another party, which he calls law-abiding and law-loving people of Kansas, who have been, according to him, carrying on the unequal contest of maintaining the law against rebellion and revolution, by the aid of Federal bayonets. And, in reference to this condition of things in the Territory, he asks these questions:

“Such being the unfortunate condition of affairs in the Territory, what was the right, as well as the duty, of the law-abiding people? Were they silently and patiently to submit to the Topeka usurpation, or adopt the necessary measures to establish a constitution under the authority of the organic law of Congress?”

And he answers approvingly, that the Territorial Legislature passed a law creating a convention to frame a constitution; and that the convention thus created did, by virtue of the authority vested in them by that act, frame the Lecompton constitution. And he concludes in these words:

“From this review it is manifest that the Lecompton convention, according to every principle of constitutional law, was legally constituted, and was invested with power to frame a constitution.”

And that the constitution and State government, the work of that convention, has been framed “in strict accordance with the organic act.”

This proposition is the foundation of the President's whole argument; and all the other considerations urged by him are built upon this. If, therefore, this proposition be not true, then the whole foundation of the message fails, and it falls baseless to the ground. The inquiry, therefore, becomes a pertinent one, whence comes this legality? and from what source does this constitution derive the authority of law?

The Lecompton convention is the creature of the Territorial Legislature. It derived all its authority and power from that Legislature. No one ever claimed for it that it derived any power from the people outside of the form of territorial law; for to do that, would be to go to the same source from which the Topeka convention derived its authority. And if it be “reasonable” for the one to drink at that fountain, it cannot be “legal” for the other to partake of the same poisonous draft. If, then, the Lecompton convention derived all its power and authority from the Territorial Legislature, the question next arises, had the Legislature itself the power to clothe this convention with authority to form a constitution and State government? Now, the Territorial Legislature derives all its power from the organic act. It can derive power from no other source; else it, too, will find itself going for authority to that reasonable source, the people, where the men of Topeka were debauched. In the organic act will be found both the creation and the measure of all legislative power in the Territory. And that act has defined and set limits to the power of the Legislature which it creates in express terms, beyond which it cannot go, in these words—section twenty-fourth of the act:

“The legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.”

I observed some time since, that the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] in an otherwise able argument which he addressed to us upon this point, when quoting this section, omitted the clause limiting the power of the Legislature by the provisions of the organic act, as well by the Constitution—an omission, in my opinion, fatal to his whole argument. This is his language in the Globe:

“In section twenty-four, it is further enacted that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution.”

But, sir, this section not only limits the power of the Legislature by the Constitution, but it imposes the further limit that all legislation shall also be consistent with the provisions of the act that created the Legislature. The one is just as clear, just as express, as the other. Every legislative act which conflicts with the organic law, is here made void for want of power in the Legislature; just as much, and for the same reason, that it would be void if it conflicted with the Constitution. The organic act is here made a part of the constitution of the Territory, and is supreme over its Legislature. And this must have been so in the nature of things, in the absence of any provision in the organic law upon the subject. For either the organic act, or the Legislature, must be supreme; both cannot be. But the organic act created the Legislature, and could not therefore clothe it with greater power than itself had, and could not make it supreme over itself. But enough for us is the express limit found in so many words, and entirely overlooked, not only by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] but by the President himself.

Now, the organic act nowhere provides for its own subversion or for the substitution of another government in its place. It is the charter of the Territory, and is to be annulled only by the power which created it, acting upon it directly by repeal or modification, or indirectly by the admission of the Territory into the Union with a State constitution, which is itself a repeal. It needs no argument to show that the Legislature could not delegate to a convention powers which it did not itself possess. Nor does it admit of any greater doubt that to form a constitution and State government is to act inconsistently with the organic law. It is an attempt to transfer the executive and legislative power, the whole machinery of the government into new hands, and if put in operation would subvert all territorial authority. I have the authority of the President for this position, if there were room for question. He says an attempt has been made to set up a Topeka constitution which is revolutionary and subversive of the territorial government; and adherence to it is on that ground called “reasonable pertinacity.” And the only reason why he does not find the Lecompton constitution in the same category is, that in his opinion it has legislative sanction. I am inquiring whence that authority comes, and I deny its existence; for the Legislature is expressly prohibited from its exercise.

There is another clause in the organic act, often quoted, from which it is thought by some that authority is derived to form a constitution and State government without any further enabling act. That clause is the celebrated one which “leaves the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." Those who claim that, under this clause, the Legislature has authority to create a convention clothed with power to form a constitution and State government, claim for the Legislature nothing less than power unlimited save by the Constitution of the United States, and forget that by a subsequent section the power of the same Legislature is restricted to consistency with the organic act precisely as it is to the Constitution. If the Legislature has power, under this clause, to initiate a State government subverting the organic act itself, then it would have authority, under the same clause, to provide for the election of a territorial Governor by the people, or to dispense with the presence of such a functionary altogether, or any of his official duties like the approval of an act of the Legislature. All this would be "their own way" of doing business, and would certainly be no more subversive of the organic act than the formation of an entirely new government. Does any one claim that if the Territorial Legislature of Kansas should declare that its acts should be valid without the approval of the Governor, or a vote of two thirds, such acts would be of any binding force? And why not? That would be "their own way." The answer is, that the organic act has taken this power away from the Legislature, and clothed the Governor with a veto upon all their acts, to be overridden only by a vote of two thirds. So, too, has it taken away, or, rather, never granted, the power to make a constitution. If the organic act has created a Legislature supreme over itself, it is a felo de se. It was but at the beginning of this session, and in his annual message, that the President himself claimed that the full intent and force of this clause was exhausted by an offer to the people of a vote upon the question of slavery merely, without, at that time, the slightest pretence that it had the force of an enabling act.

Whatever else, after all, may be "the true intent and meaning" of this clause of the organic law which has so puzzled the brains of politicians, it was never intended to make the Legislature "perfectly free;" for the power of that body is limited elsewhere, in express terms. And the perfect freedom here created is for "the people thereof," not in or through their Legislature, which by the same law is not perfectly free, but limited and restricted. If, therefore, the Lecompton convention gets legal existence and lawful authority from this clause, it is not through the limited powers of the Legislature which created it, and the forms of their law which they had no power to enact, but through that perfect freedom of "the people thereof," outside of and above any territorial enactment, which has been vouchsafed to that people by this clause of the organic act. And thus Lecompton, like Topeka, is driven, for its authority to make a constitution, to the people, outside of territorial enactment. In this particular, these two constitutions stand their stand side by side. If the one be "rebellious," "revolutionary," "treasonable," so is the other. Under and by virtue of any authority imparted to either by the organic act, or any of its agencies, they must stand or fall together. They are both nothing more nor less than manifestations to some extent—what that extent, as to each, may be, I shall inquire hereafter; but to some extent—of the popular will in the Territory, permitted by the organic act, as everywhere else under our free institutions, so long as they do not assume the functions of government in subversion of established laws.

I have inquired, not whether this constitution comes here under the forms of law, but, rather, whether it is here clothed with the majesty and authority of law. I do not question any man's power to use the forms of law; but they are empty words, a dead letter, until the constituted authorities, with creative power, breathe into them the breath of life. The Kansas Legislature, as well as an individual, may put upon paper what it pleases; but whatever of its decrees conflict with the organic act, fall still-born; for it is forbidden by the hand that created it from impairing one jot or tittle of that charter. Nor do I question that the people of Kansas may form a State constitution without further legislation by Congress, and be admitted into the Union under it, if that constitution shall be "the sense of the people to be affected by it;" but not by means of any enactment of the Territorial Legislature having any force as law, for the Le-gisature is forbidden to speak authoritatively on that subject. The conclusion, therefore, is inevitable, that just so far as the Lecompton constitution claimed from legislative enactment authority to form a State constitution, just so far it is without foundation. The attempt, therefore, in the message to commend the Lecompton constitution as the creature of law, and as an emanation from the lawful authority of the Territory, utterly fails; and the hideous deformities of that instrument stand forth in their nakedness, uncloaked and unsupported by legal sanction. The law, thank God, has as yet refused to lend its instrumentality to this work—has, as yet, given no aid or comfort to this undertaking; and it must stand, if at all, on some other foundation.

But, sir, I have not quite done with this point. If further argument were necessary to show the utter failure of the attempt on the part of the President to bolster up this sickly instrument with legal sanction, it is furnished us in the means to which he resorts to maintain his position. An honest argument is based upon an honest foundation. Reason and logic, as well as honesty, hold us to the truth just so long as the truth will serve our purposes; and when we turn our footsteps aside from her rugged pathway, we make proclamation to the world that we cannot reach our journey's end under her guidance. Now, by what process does the President undertake to convince us and the country that the Kansas-Nebraska act authorized the Legislature of Kansas to create the Lecompton convention clothed with power to frame a constitution and State government? Here are his words in quoting from that law to sustain his position:

"That this law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without any enabling act from Congress, to form a State constitution, is too clear for argument. For Congress 'to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free,' in framing their constitution, 'to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States,' and then to say that they shall not be permitted to proceed and frame a constitution in their own way without an express authority from Congress, appears to be almost a contradiction in terms."

Now, I agree with the President, that there appears in this paragraph, as thus quoted, "almost a contradiction in terms." But something else appears in this paragraph, less excusable than a contradiction in terms—and that is an interpolation into the organic act. The words, "in framing their constitution," which I have quoted from this message, are not to be found in the Kansas-Nebraska act, and have been here foisted in between the words of that act by the President himself. I will not stop to characterize such a proceeding in the terms which honesty and truth and justice demand—for I have to do, at this moment, merely with the legal argument of the President. And I say that the necessity of that argument required that something for its support should be put into the organic act not there before. Such a reading, unparalleled as it is in the history of official communications to Congress, would never have been resorted to but from the conviction of its author that there was nothing in the text without it to support the assumption of the message. It is a proclamation, made in the fore-front of that remarkable document, that it cannot stand upon the statute as it is. I summon the President himself upon the stand, and in this communication, which he has made to us, I produce his confession that he can find no law of the land upon which, as it is upon the statute-book, can this Lecompton constitution be maintained.

And now, sir, I pass to the second subject of inquiry. If, then, the Lecompton constitution does not come here recommended by the authority of law, I desire to know whether it comes here as the choice of the majority of the people of that ill-fated Territory? I desire to know if the want of legal authority to frame this constitution is cured, as it may be, by the fact that it is the voice of the people whose rights it assumes to regulate and control? Or, whether we are not called upon to force upon an unwilling, a protesting, and resisting people, a frame of government founded neither upon the law under which they live, nor the will of those on whom it lays its fetters?

This is a question of fact, and must depend upon the testimony. It is a question, too, which underlies all the others. To every one who believes that all governments derive their just authority from the consent of the governed, no question can be raised in this controversy of greater magnitude than whether the frame of government about to be fastened upon the people of Kansas has their assent, and embodies their will. All informalities may be waived, if it be but the people that speak. Compared with this question, it matters little where this constitution originated—whether in the city of Washington or in the office of the surveyor-general of Kansas. But it does matter, unless we care to forego and forget the fundamental principle of all free government, whether the people of Kansas, who are to live under this constitution, desire it or not. One would suppose that, before recommending the admission of Kansas under and subject to this constitution, the Executive would have spared no pains, nor omitted any effort, to have made certain, and communicated to this House, the one grand transcendent fact, before which all opposition should have paled and cowered—that the people of the Territory desire to take upon themselves this as their organic law. Yet, sir, when we turn to the message for information upon this point, we find that the President has none to give. There is a great deal else in that document, but not one word on the question whether the people of Kansas really do or do not want this government. There is much special pleading in it as to how a people may seem to want what they really do not want—how they may be estopped from saying what they do want, and as to whose fault it is that this or that has been done, or has not been done; but not one word, from the beginning to the end of the message, which would indicate the President's own opinion upon this, the one great fundamental question in the controversy, whether the people of Kansas themselves have breathed the breath of life into this instrument—whether it stands forth clothed with the popular will, quickened by the pulsations of the popular heart, and speaking the popular voice. Nor has the President lifted his finger to ascertain from Kansas what is the popular will. He has communicated to the call of the Senate his correspondence with the Governors of that Territory, and the orders and instructions which have been issued to them. And there is not to be found among them all the desire expressed, on his part, to know what is the real popular will in that Territory in reference to this instrument. In communicating this constitution to us, with his recommendation that Kansas be admitted under and subject to it, he nowhere tells us that it is an emanation of the popular will, or that it is submitted to us in obedience to that will. On the contrary, he says he has received it from John Calhoun, and that John Calhoun hopes he will submit it to us. Here is his compliance with Calhoun's request:

"I have received from J. Calhoun, Esq., President of the late constitutional convention of Kansas, a copy, duly certified by himself, of the constitution framed by that body, with the expression of a hope that I would submit the same to the consideration of Congress, 'with the view of the admission of Kansas into the Union as an independent State.'"

It is fit that such a man should be the bearer of such an instrument. "Fit head for fit body." The man who has been compelled to flee from the just indignation of the people he is betraying, guarded by United States dragoons; the man who dare not to-day show his head an hour in that Territory, except it be within a hollow square of soldiers, comes as near as any one man can of personifying the true relation between the people of Kansas and that constitution. They hate him as the chief instrument chosen by their oppressors to do their work, and they detest and loathe and hate this, the workmanship of his hands. Now, is it not a little remarkable that the Chief Magistrate of a people which achieved its national existence in the assertion of the principle that all authority over freemen obtains its life from the consent of the governed, should have had his mind so turned away from this, the true issue, as not even to have raised the inquiry, whether the people who are to live under this constitution do themselves actually choose it or not? Is it not stranger still that the ear of the President has become so dull to the key-note of that grand old anthem sung in Independence Hall, that he has never heard that while we have been discussing this subject in this body, the freemen of Kansas have walked up to the ballot-box, ten thousand strong, and set the seal of their condemnation upon the very instrument he is urging us to impose upon the necks of the very people who have thus rejected it with scorn and contempt? I cannot stop to criticise the President's excuse for not having heard of this judgment entered up against the Lecompton constitution—that he “had received no official information” of it; nor to reconcile that excuse with what he does communicate that he has heard, transpiring at the same election: of a large majority of the opponents of this constitution voting under it for State officers. Can he not hear of the one vote, as well as the other, happening on the same day? If he have any other ears than official ones, it may well be asked why they have not caught the thunder tones of the ten thousand majority against the Lecompton constitution, as well as the insignificant inconsistency with which he has troubled himself of free-State men at that same election, in voting first against the constitution, and then for officers under it. If this can reach him from unofficial sources, has he no ears to hear that other solemn, all-controlling adjudication of the whole people against this instrument?

But another chapter in this history here opens, as marvelous as any which have preceded it, and in perfect keeping with them all. In the profound silence of the message upon the expressed will of the people, in the strange revelations of the executive documents that not a finger has been raised nor an ear opened to learn that will; and in the presence of that other fact, which has traveled here without executive aid, and in spite of executive documents piled up to wall it out, that the people have written on that instrument in letters which will burn through it that by ten thousand majority they have registered their vow that they will never submit to it; and have driven the guilty perpetrators of this outrage upon their rights in ignominious flight from their borders; amid all these facts, and allegations more serious, the friends of the Administration rush to the aid of the Executive in attempting to stifle all inquiry as to what all these things mean; and whether we are not called upon to fasten, by the strong arm of power, a constitution which they loathe and hate, upon a people who have a sacred right themselves to make the law they are called upon to obey. There was a time when the Representatives of the people would have been as sensitive to such a touch as the apple of the eye. Now they are quick only to conceal it. But no subterfuge can change or blot out these facts. The solemn judgment of the people of Kansas is written on this constitution, and will be known and read of all men. We may wrangle as long as we please, with dictionaries and tomes at our elbow, as to the effect of this vote upon the legality of the constitution; but the proposition that the Legislature of Kansas cannot provide for “taking the sense of the people” upon that instrument, and that that sense when taken cannot be known, has neither foundation in law nor common sense. The constitution may, nevertheless, stand. So will the “sense of the people” stand, and it will be known as the sense of the people. Whatever investigation you may resist or stifle here, it will in no way alter or wipe out these truths. This charge of attempting to force, at the point of the bayonet, a constitution upon an unwilling people is branded upon your brow, and the blood spilt in the work will be found on your hands. It will be of very little use for you to cry,

“Out, damned spot!”

The potency of that party Shibboleth—Democracy—may be again, for the thousandth time, invoked; the cry of popular sovereignty may be unceasingly rung; but the truth will remain unaltered, that, in the name of all these, liberty has been trampled in the dust, and fetters forged for her unwilling limbs. In olden time, the philosopher was persecuted and beaten and cast into prison till he was compelled to deny himself; but the earth moved on, nevertheless, and the great truths he had enunciated took upon themselves immortality, regardless of his own puny efforts to call them back. There is an immortality of infamy as well as of glory. No matter by what party thumbscrew you may subject the refractory, or by what arts you may ply the supple, till, by your votes, the record shall show no evidence of the foul wrong within this Hall; still it will work no change on these truths, and the outrage remains, nevertheless, bald and naked, never to pass out of sight till avenged or redressed.

This very attempt to stifle investigation and choke inquiry, is itself a confession. It is not because investigation will refute, but because it will sustain, these charges, that it is resisted. The reason why men love darkness rather than light is made no more certain by the pen of inspiration than by the course of the Administration upon this question. The very message under consideration contains ample proof, not only in what it takes vain care to conceal, but also in what it makes haste to communicate, of the truth of the charge of attempting, through the Lecompton constitution, to crush out popular sovereignty and the right of self-government in Kansas, which is now laid at the door of this Administration. The President cannot state his case but he states himself out of court. When he tells us that the people of Kansas are in a state of rebellion, and acknowledges the difficulty of making the American people realize the fact, attributing it to a great delusion, let him show what the people of Kansas have to rebel against, if they have been left “perfectly free to form their own institutions in their own way,” and he will remove the delusion. Men do not rebel against themselves, nor the work of their own hands. When he tells us that the established order of things in Kansas “would have been long since subverted” by any portion of the people sufficient to subvert it, had it not been protected by United States bayonets, he proclaims, in the same sentence, that the power which created, as well as the power which sustains, that order of things, never emanated from the people of Kansas. For men do not pillage, nor pollute, nor pull down the temple of their own rearing. When he announces that a form of government, twice ratified by the people, “is in direct opposition to the existing government,” and that it requires, to keep it down, the constant presence of United States dragoons in a Territory “left perfectly free” to manage its own affairs in its own way, he confesses, in the same breath, that the standing Army has been used to crush out the exercise of that right of self-government, the struggle to achieve which commenced in blood at Concord, and ended in triumph at Yorktown. Why is it that this home Government of ours does not require the constant presence of a standing Army to preserve and protect it? Why is it not necessary for the Chief Magistrate of the nation, when he goes forth upon the avenue, to surround himself with gensd'armes, bristling with steel, to protect and rescue him from the deadly missives of the populace? Why is it that the approaches to this Hall are not guarded by soldiers, between whose bayonets we might march in and out from our deliberations here, shielded from the passions of men without? Why is it that the judiciary, from the highest tribunal at the Capitol to the humblest magistrate in the remotest hamlet, sits secure in the seat of justice, calmly deliberating and fearlessly pronouncing decrees to which all the people bow in silence? Why is it that a standing Army, equal in numbers and power to the extent and greatness of this Government, is not spread over the land, from this center to the outermost borders, to uphold, by its strong arm, the authority of law, and to awe, by its imposing presence, the people into submission? The answer to all this is apparent; and I invoke its application to Kansas. The strength of this Government is in the consent of the governed. Without this all-pervading element it could not survive an hour. The fair fabric would tumble in ruins over our heads, and the bonds which bind us together would part like smoking flax. No matter in what garb this constitution comes here, nor from what authority it professes to emanate, if it requires the continual presence of the Army to preserve and protect that authority among the people of Kansas; then, I say, it never came from that people. When, therefore, the President declares, in this message, that the Army is necessary to maintain that authority, he confesses that the people never breathed into it the breath of life, and the world will enter up judgment upon that confession.

The Lecompton constitution, therefore, comes to us without the sanction of legal authority; and equally without that other sanction—the will of the people—which, under the circumstances, is higher and more sacred than all the forms of law. Without this seal, I cannot take it; without this baptism, I can hold no communion with it; without this anointing, I eschew it.

Now, sir, the real reason why this constitution is thus urged upon us is just as manifest as the falsity of the pretended one. It banishes free institutions and forever fastens slavery upon that virgin soil. No man who has eyes to see, or ears to hear, need fail to understand whether it be to justify or to condemn. No man can longer doubt, but at the expense of his common sense. I can understand and appreciate the zeal of southern men for the consummation of this work. It is the legitimate fruit of slavery. That institution can bear no better. And when a man has lived all his life among slave institutions, and has never seen the effect of freedom upon the whole man—physical, intellectual, and moral—never himself breathed the invigorating atmosphere of free institutions—I can understand how such a man may come to actually believe that the forms of “a republican government, surrounded by slave institutions, would be the highest type of civilization.” And I may respect him for the frankness of the avowal, however much I may regret the misfortune of his life which has led to such convictions. I can even hear from the lips of a man of such an education and life [Mr. SHORTER] that he has “a sovereign contempt for the memory of the Pilgrim Fathers,” with no other emotions than, the one of pity for him, and the other of gratitude to God, as one of the descendants of that immortal band, that their memory does merit the contempt of the lords of the lash and the founders of a colored aristocracy. But I fail to comprehend how it is possible for a man now in the decline of a life which had its origin in one of the noblest of the free States—who was reared under the shadow of free institutions—has watched their growth in all that makes a State great and glorious—has witnessed, under their expanding influence, commonwealths spring out of the wilderness into the full maturity of manhood, guarantying to all the people thereof the God-given rights of freemen, all the branches of industry taking life and bearing fruit in their soil, and comfort and competence smiling on every hearth-stone in all their borders—I say I cannot understand, it is utterly incomprehensible to me, how such a man, false to all these noble affinities, can undertake, from high position and power, to crush out free institutions, and force in their stead upon an unwilling and resisting people slavery with all its attendant train of curses and woes and misery.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] in an effort to turn public attention away from the astounding doctrines of this message by eloquent personal eulogy, told us imploringly that the President “is now upon his political trial.” I wish this were so, and this were all. But, sir, you put the President on his political trial for years before you clothed him with power to do this work. And he long since gave indubitable proof that he could be trusted for the accomplishment of any work that slavery should demand at his hand. And then it was, and not till then, that he was permitted to wear the imperial purple. There is, nevertheless, a trial of quite another sort. More than one hundred thousand freemen in Kansas, and the institutions under which they and their children are to live till the remotest generation, and till millions shall people that fair land, making it, for good or for evil, a Power upon the earth, are this day on their trial. And yet we are told in the message that this trial is of “not the slightest importance,” to them, and is a “cause, so far as the interests of Kansas are concerned, more trifling and insignificant than has ever stirred the elements of a great people into commotion.” The answer of the President, when it is shown that half the counties of that great Territory have been disfranchised, is that they were only “a comparatively few voters.” And the cool reply from the same high source to all opposition is, that “the affairs of this Territory have already engrossed an undue proportion of public attention;” and the people whom this decision affects are only “a few thousand inhabitants of Kansas!”

And in betrayal of this people the message bids us, who are bound by the high behests of duty, let the consequences be what they may, to take counsel of our fears. It tells us that, unless we now consummate this outrage which has been ripening under the fostering care of the Executive for years, “no man can foretell the consequences;” that “agitation upon this dangerous subject will be renewed in a more alarming form than it has ever yet assumed;” that just in proportion as this question is insignificant to the few thousand people of Kansas, who detest this constitution, "for this very reason"—that is, because it is an insignificant question—

"The rejection of the constitution will be so much the more keenly felt by the people of fourteen of the States of this Union where slavery is recognized under the Constitution of the United States."

I wish, in passing, to inquire which of the fifteen slave States it is whose people have been counted out here, and have determined not only not to dissolve the Union, but not even to "feel keenly" if this foul scheme shall fail. Perhaps the Representatives of that State here can inform the country. And, lastly, we are told by the President, that unless this bald crime against human rights shall be perpetrated, "dark and ominous clouds," which he seems to see already "impending over the Union," are to "become darker and more ominous than any which have ever yet threatened the Constitution and the Union." I do not share these fears of the President. I do not see these clouds. I shall be slow to believe that the perpetuity of this Union requires the sanction of this fraud. But if I did share these fears, I should be derelict of duty if I took counsel of them. If I saw these clouds, I should still find no justification for the abandonment of right in the apprehension that else they might break over my head. This doctrine has been preached to us quite too often already; it was never sound; and has begotten many a peril without ever averting a single one. It can answer no further ends.

The President's hopes, too, are as vain as his fears. How empty the expectation that "domestic peace will be the happy consequence of this admission," or that it "would restore peace and quiet to the whole country," or that the troops of the United States could then be withdrawn from Kansas. Peace comes not of schemes thus founded in wrong and carried out by fraud and force. Commotion and conflict more terrible than those which have already shamed and shocked the country, will be the fruit gathered of such a sowing. He that "soweth the wind" shall most assuredly "reap the whirlwind." You may cry peace! peace! but to you who daub with this untempered mortar there can be no peace.

Does the President hope, before the bar of inexorable justice, to escape the just condemnation of one who, with full knowledge of fraud, aids in its consummation—of one who feeds and fattens and hugs to his bosom the perpetrators of robberies, of rapes, and of murders, while their hands are still reeking with crime? He knows the foul wrongs which gave birth to this constitution, and the infamous outrages upon which it has fed; and with full knowledge, by this message he adopts and makes them all his own. Thus, voluntarily taking upon himself the responsibility of all the black and damning plots and schemes and frauds and crimes which have brought the Lecompton constitution here, he goes for trial before that august tribunal, the American people, and I patiently await the verdict.

Mr. KEITT obtained the floor.

Mr. ENGLISH. If the gentleman from South Carolina yields the floor, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to have an understanding of this. There seems to be a great many speeches on this subject to be got out yet. Why should we not, as we did last Congress, hold evening sessions for the purpose of general debate? If we do not, we will not be able to adjourn the session before August.

Mr. DOWDELL. If the gentleman from South Carolina does not desire to go on this evening, there are a good many who desire to speak who would be glad to go on now. If the gentleman will allow me, I will speak this evening.

Mr. KEITT. I will very cheerfully yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama to allow him to speak, and to any other gentleman who may desire to speak this evening, if I can have the privilege of the floor to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to any such arrangement.

Mr. KEITT. The indulgence which I ask, and which I know has been repeatedly extended to gentlemen, is this: I do not want to go on to-night. There are many gentlemen who do wish to speak. I say, then, that I will not ask now that the committee rise, but am willing that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DOWDELL] shall make his speech to-night, and that I shall be allowed the floor when the committee meet again.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The proposition is a very reasonable one, and I hope it will be assented to.

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object to any arrangement. Let us have the speeches regularly, as usual.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Houstoun reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 6, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask permission of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, to provide for erecting a building in the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, for a post office and custom-house.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM CHAUNCEY LANGDON. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented additional evidence in support of the claim of Eliza G. Townsend to a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, for the enactment of a law giving each actual settler a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FITCH presented the memorial of F. W. Lander, praying for compensation for a reconnaissance made by him of a railroad route from Puget Sound, via the South Pass, to the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BIGLER presented the memorial of James McCutchen, an invalid pensioner, praying for an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

TEXAS ON KANSAS.

Mr. HOUSTON. I present joint resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, in response to the Governor's message on Kansas affairs; and I ask that they may be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Joint resolutions in response to the Governor's message on Kansas.

Whereas, there exists, and has existed, a violent determination on the part of a portion of the inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas to exclude, by force, the citizens of the slaveholding States from a just, equal, and peaceful participation in the use and enjoyment of the common property and territory of the members of the Confederacy; and whereas, this determination, owing to the state of political feeling in the northern States of the Confederacy, operating upon the Federal Government, may become effectual and the exclusion perpetual: Therefore,

1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That the Governor of this State is hereby authorized to order an election for seven delegates, to meet delegates appointed by the other southern States in convention, whenever the Executives of a majority of the slaveholding States shall express the opinion that such convention is necessary to preserve the equal rights of such States in the Union, and advise the Governor of this State that measures have been taken for the appointment of delegates to meet those of Texas. And that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the mileage and per diem of such delegates, which shall be paid at the rate paid to members of the United States Congress, according to the law in force in the year 1854.

2. That, should an exigency arise, in the opinion of the Governor, in which it is necessary for the State of Texas to act alone, or by a convention representing the sovereignty of the State, he is hereby requested to call a special session of the Legislature to provide for such State convention.

3. That the Governor is requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to the Executives of each of the slaveholding States, and to our members of Congress.

Approved, February 16, 1858.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

AUSTIN, TEXAS, February 23, 1858.

I, the undersigned, Secretary of State of the State of Texas, do certify that the above and foregoing is a correct copy of the original joint resolutions on file in this Department.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the Department of State, this day and year first above written.

[L. S.] T. S. ANDERSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the resolutions be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Taylor county, Iowa, praying to be allowed to enter, at the minimum price, certain lands on which they have entered, submitted an adverse report, on the ground that no legislation on the subject is necessary. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Edward N. Kent, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 188) for the relief of Edward N. Kent. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Rufus Dwinel, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back the bill and report formerly presented in the case of Sturges, Bennett & Co., and to state that the committee unanimously concur in all that part of the former report which disposes of the claim itself. Some of the members reserve the right of dissenting from some of the subsequent reasoning. I do not see any of them now in their seats. I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The report was laid on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 8) for the relief of John Hamilton was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate whether the island of Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, is longer needed for military purposes; and if not, whether any steps have been taken for a disposition of the same.

THOMAS AP CATESBY JONES.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. MASON, to insert after the word "pay," the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MASON. I offered that amendment at the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.] It is a mere formal matter. The bill was very fully discussed the other day, and I am not disposed to trouble the Senate any further about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. When the Senate passed from the consideration of this subject the other day, I had so nearly concluded all that I designed to say on the bill, that I do not deem it necessary now to recapitulate my argument. I sought to show that the proposition was not within the constitutional authority of the Senate; and, as a test vote on that subject, I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not propose to say anything on this subject until I heard what fell from the honorable Senator from Michigan. I listened to him very carefully. He seemed to start the idea that we were without constitutional power to pass this bill. I understood him at first to found his objection on the fact that this was like a forfeiture which had been declared by the judgment of a court, and that the attempt to allow this officer to receive the pay of his rank while he was suspended, was really to overrule the decision of the court. I have been unable to see the force of that argument. If this were the case of a penalty which had been adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the money had been paid and was in the Treasury, I do not see why we are without power to remit that money. Certain it is that that money cannot, by any action of the Executive in pardoning the offender after his conviction, (for that is the only power he has—the power to pardon,) and after the money had been paid into the Treasury, be returned to the man. It is in the Treasury; it must be taken out by an appropriation bill for the purpose. Now, the effect of suspending an officer's pay for a certain period of time is the same thing. It leaves so much money in the Treasury; and it seems to me, if the case is one which, on its merits—and I have nothing to say particularly on the merits of this claim—requires our attention, this is the only way to attain the object.

It appears to me further that there is another reason. The appropriations which are made for the Navy and Army under the provisions of our Constitution fall at the expiration of two years, and then go into the surplus fund. If there was an appropriation for paying officers in those years when this money was withholden, that has passed by, and not having been paid in those years, it falls, and of course, if any provision is to be made for paying this officer there must be a new appropriation.

So much for the necessity of this law, provided this is one of those cases which, on their merits, require our attention. The honorable Senator from Michigan, in his last remarks in answer to the honorable Senator from Virginia, does not seem to think there is so much difficulty in this bill, on the ground that it interferes with the result of the judgment of a court; but he falls back on another ground, and he says it is not to pay a debt. He says we have power to appropriate money simply for the purpose of paying our debts; and that this is not a pecuniary debt. That seems to me to be going back to grounds which it is hardly worth while now, at this late day of our practical construction of the Constitution, to undertake to debate. If that idea be correct, we cannot give a man a pension; it is not a debt. We cannot give a man a sword; it is not a debt. We cannot give La Fayette land; it is not a debt. We cannot make any bounties of any kind; they are not debts. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is quite too late to undertake to debate that point. We have a right, I apprehend, to pay our debts of gratitude. If we can liquidate such calls, I think we should meet them. I have felt bound to say thus much simply because of the constitutional point which has been introduced into the discussion.

Mr. STUART. It seems that the exact position which I occupied on this subject is not very well understood, at least by the Senator from Vermont. I took the ground the other day, that the suspension of this officer's pay was a result produced by the judgment of a court-martial. He sets forth in his memorial that he was arraigned and tried by a court-martial, and a judgment rendered against him; that judgment was, that he should be suspended from service in the Navy for five years, two and a half years of that time without pay. The ground upon which he puts his memorial is, that that judgment was improperly rendered against him; that it was improper, even to the reception of ex parte evidence, and therefore he asks to have the money refunded. That being the case, I took the position that for Congress to interpose on that ground, was a direct interference with the constitutional authority of the President.

Mr. MASON. The bill puts it on a different ground altogether.

Mr. STUART. The Senator is mistaken. The bill provides that this money shall be paid to him, and couples with it a proviso that this act shall not be construed as expressing any opinion on the correctness of the judgment. Now, sir, I ask the honorable Senator from Vermont, what is the groundwork of this bill? Does it assume that the Government of the United States owes a debt of gratitude to this individual? Not at all. I conceded the other day that the United States undoubtedly had authority to pay such obligations; that they are as much debts as any others, but that it is not within the power of Congress to assume an indebtedness, and then assume the payment of it. Congress cannot say of their own accord, "we owe A B, and we vote A B a hundred thousand dollars." I grant you, sir, that the bill which was passed for the relief of General Jackson was within the constitutional authority of Congress, because the United States owed him an immense debt of gratitude, and had a right to pay it like any other debt.

You may vote a man a sword for eminent services; but I would ask where is the authority to vote a man a sword who never did anything at all for his country? That would be a mere pretense. Is any gentleman prepared to say that we have a right to vote just as much money out of the Treasury as our discretion dictates, by way of a donation? Where do you get the authority? The authority of Congress is defined in the Constitution. If there is any such authority as that, gentlemen can put their finger on the place in which it is defined. I do not find it; but the authority to raise money to pay the debts of the Confederacy is what I alluded to the other day. Is this bill put upon that ground? Does this bill proceed on the ground that we owe this individual the money? Certainly not.

Is there any specification in his memorial, in the preamble to the bill, in the testimony in the case, that he falls within that class of persons to whom the country owes a debt of gratitude? Not a word of it; but, as I said, he puts his case upon the ground that he asks us to reverse the decision of the court pro tanto. If Congress act upon his case at all, they act upon his statement of the case. He claims that he shall be paid these two and a half years' pay, because he was improperly deprived of it by a court-martial. Now, I ask where is the authority to interpose? I took occasion, the other day, to say, so that there should be no ground for misapprehension, that doubtless we could pay a debt of gratitude, as well as any other debt; but I say again that we cannot assume that there is a debt, when the individual himself does not assume it, and then go on to pay it by legislation.

If Congress can interpose now, and pay these two and a half years' pay, why could they not interpose by law to reverse the judgment, so far as the suspension of service was concerned? Where is the difference? Suppose this individual had asked Congress, immediately after the judgment was pronounced against him, to pass a law reversing the suspension and restoring him to active service in the Navy, could it be done? If not; why not? Where is the distinction between such an effort and this one? It does seem to me that the distinction does not exist, and that it is impossible to define it. The ground that I took, the only ground I have occupied is, that this is asking Congress to do what the President of the United States by the Constitution is himself authorized to do. The authority rests there, and nowhere else. The President, in this case, has exercised the authority, and refused to do anything more than to relieve the individual of the remaining two and a half years of suspension.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I differ from the honorable Senator from Michigan in the construction he gives to the authority of Congress in reference to the right to order money to be paid out of the Treasury to any individual where we suppose it has unjustly or prejudicially to him come into the Treasury. It is his money. I do not care whether you call it a debt, or an equitable claim, or what you please. If, in the judgment of Congress, there is money in the Treasury which ought to be in the hands of an individual, there is no other mode in which it can go to him, (not even by executive pardon,) after it once gets into the Treasury, than by the action of the Legislature. The Legislature certainly would not have the right, where a man was convicted of an offense punishable by death, or in any other mode, to interpose by law and say that he should not be punished, because that power belongs to the Executive; but if, as part of the punishment, a fine is inflicted which is paid into the Treasury, and it requires the action of Congress to pay that money out, it does not follow that Congress have not the right to restore to him the money, if they think it has been unjustly exacted.

Congress have exercised this right in a great variety of cases. I will instance a case, between which and the principle of this bill I cannot see any difference. During the operation of the non-intercourse laws of 1809, there were a great variety of importations from St. Domingo and other West India islands, which, according to the letter of the law, subjected the cargo to seizure and confiscation. It was, in many instances, seized and confiscated, and the money paid into the Treasury, without remission by the Secretary of the Treasury. There was some doubt about the extent of his power; but he undoubtedly had a power of remission in certain cases. To my own knowledge, in many of these cases, Congress passed laws to repay to the parties the money which had been paid into the Treasury as the result of the sentence of a court of justice, where no remission had been made by the executive authority, to whom the power was given to make remission. Congress thought that such cases were not within the policy and intent of the law; that there had been nothing prejudicial to the country in the act of the parties making those importations, and that it was a hardship to them to keep their money in the Treasury; and they therefore, in the only mode in which it could be done, ordered it by act of Congress to be repaid.

I have known several cases of that kind. I cannot distinguish between a case where money which had been paid into the Treasury, under a sentence of a court was repaid, and a case where, in consequence of a sentence, the party could not receive the money, and therefore the appropriation which would be applicable to pay him, has fallen through lapse of time. We then simply renew the appropriation, conceiving that the party ought to have received the money before, though a court-martial may have thought differently. So in the other case, the sentence of the court brought the party within the letter of the law, and he had to pay the money. I cannot distinguish between the cases. I think there is merit in this application, and I see no constitutional objection to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. After what fell from the honorable Senator from Virginia the other day, in regard to the present condition of the memorialist, it seems exceedingly hard, almost cruel, to vote against the passage of this bill, and yet, sir, I feel compelled to vote against it, and I will give my reasons for so doing in a word. The memorialist set forth that he was tried by a naval court-martial, and after that trial, was sentenced to five years' suspension from the service, and for the first two and a half years without pay or emolument. He then says:

"This severe sentence was passed, as your memorialist verily believes, and is well assured by several distinguished jurists familiar with court-martial practice, on testimony essentially defective, even to the admission of ex parte evidence, as the official record of the court attests, and on which your memorialist was justly entitled to full and honorable acquittal."

For these and other reasons, he prays relief. If the facts set forth in the memorial are true, he is entitled to relief, and this bill ought to be passed; but if they are not true, and the court-martial did justice in the premises, what right have we to say that the sentence was too severe, and to remit the penalty so far as the money is concerned? Do the committee, in their report, tell us that the facts stated in this memorial are true, and that the court-martial committed injustice? If they told us so, I should cheerfully vote for the bill; but they do not. On the contrary, the proviso to the bill contains these most significant words:

"Provided, That this act is not to be construed as an expression of opinion upon the organization, conduct, or decision of said court."

The organization, the conduct, and the decision of the court are, by the committee, untouched, and are to stand as having been as they ought to have been. Now, sir, in that state of things, can we find the facts alleged in this petition to be true? I certainly cannot; and if they are not true, and if this memorialist has not had injustice done him, and he was tried by his peers, why should we now remit this penalty and pay back the money, which is his money, it is true, if he was wrongfully deprived of it? but if it did not belong to him, surely it is not his money, and ought not to be paid to him. If the proviso be stricken from the bill, or if the committee will say that the court-martial did injustice to Commodore Jones, I will cheerfully go with the Senator from Virginia in voting this amount—nay, I will go further. If the bill be amended so as to make this a payment to Commodore Jones for gallant services rendered to his country in former days, I will vote for that; for I know enough of the past history of Commodore Jones to vote such an appropriation most cheerfully. But, sir, I want to do a right thing in a right way, and not in a wrong one. I therefore, with the proviso in the bill, and with the allegations in this memorial, cannot vote for the passage of the bill in its present form.

Mr. MASON. Commodore Jones was in command of the Pacific squadron on the coast of California, before California was admitted into the Union, and while that Territory existed in the anomalous state that it maintained for a considerable time; and we all know that not in the Navy alone, but in the Army, it was supposed in many quarters that very great irregularities had taken place in the conduct of the military government, and by many in the conduct of the naval government. I was one of those who thought there were many and great irregularities in the conduct of the military rule in California. The charges against Commodore Jones, which were investigated by the court-martial, related to irregularities that were charged on him in his conduct of the naval service. The court found him guilty of the charges, and suspended him for five years, one half of the time to be deprived of his pay. It was a very severe sentence. The President, after the lapse, I think, of two and a half years, remitted the suspension from active service, which exhausted the power of the Executive, as the President believed. That was done by President Fillmore. Commodore Jones now applies to Congress to remit so much of the sentence, for it is a substantial remission, as deprived him of his pay for the two and a half years. In his memorial, which has been read, he places it upon the ground that in his judgment, and, as the memorialist alleges, in the judgment of eminent counsel, the court did err in admitting ex parte evidence, and committed other informalities and irregularities which were charged upon the court.

"The honorable Senator from Connecticut says the committee have not found that that is true, because they have put a proviso to the bill which excludes such a conclusion; but it does not follow, by any means, that that involves a question of veracity between the petitioner and the committee that acted upon his petition. It is certainly very natural that one, goaded as Commodore Jones was by the proceedings of that court, and by the censure of the court, advanced in years, conscious, as doubtless he was and had a right to be, of a great deal of self-reliance from his great experience in the public service as a sailor and in command of our ships, should take a different view of the action of the court; and he says—and I have no doubt with truth, for he is a man of truth—that counsel sustain him in it. But when he makes that the groundwork of his petition, it does not follow, that because it may not be the case, he has departed from the truth. There is a difference in the judgment of the two parties.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly did not mean to make an issue of veracity at all—not by any means.

Mr. MASON. I did not so understand, in its strictest sense. There is a difference in the judgment of the two parties, and, as an impartial observer, I should say, without having a knowledge of the facts, that the court is far more probably right than Commodore Jones; for the court is to be presumed to be impartial, and Commodore Jones not, it being his own case. But it is very natural, and not only pardonable but commendable, that an officer of his service, of his age, and of his condition before the country, in asking redress, should place it on such a ground that, if relieved at all, would, in his judgment, relieve him, and all who came after him, from the implied censure of the court.

That is all he has done; but the committee and the bill place it on a totally different ground. I was surprised, therefore, to hear the honorable Senator from Michigan insist that if we pass this bill, we effect the judgment of that court. I need not say to that honorable Senator that when you look into the reasons of a law, you look to the law itself, and no further. If this bill should pass and go on your statute-book, none can know what induced the passage of the law, either in fact or legally, but what appears on the face of the law.

What will appear there? Nothing more than that the accounting officers are directed to restore to Commodore Jones the pay of which he was deprived by the judgment of the court; and lest it should be considered that that was any implied censure on the court, or any purpose to revoke, or in any manner to affect the action of the court, the proviso excludes that conclusion.

I will not argue the legal right, so strongly enforced by the honorable Senator from Vermont, and the honorable Senator from Delaware, but I will put a case—one which was passed over the other day—in regard to which such a ground, as far as I recollect, was never suggested, and, I presume, not entertained. Congress passed a law, some three or four years ago, appointing a board to revise the Navy. Under the action of that board a number of officers were deranged from their positions in the Navy, and by the law assigned to inactive service, and the pay of those officers was, by that law, not suspended, but actually reduced. They were put upon reduced pay by the terms of the law. Some two years afterwards, Congress passed another law authorizing those officers to appear before courts of inquiry, and giving authority to the President to reinstate on the active list all such as might pass those tribunals. And that law did—what? That law required that all who were thus replaced should have paid to them the difference between the pay they were receiving when they were deranged, and the pay they were receiving on the retired list. No objection was made then that Congress had not the constitutional power to do it. It was done, and, as I am informed, those officers who were thus retired have received under that law, not only the arrears of pay, but they have received the increased pay, which was the difference between the pay they were receiving when they were retired, and the pay they received afterwards.

I shall not detain the Senate further. I hope the vote will be taken.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I was not here in the beginning of this debate, but I wish to refer the Senate to another instance in which this power has been exercised, and a very strong one, in the case of Matthew Lyon, a case I well remember. Judgment was passed against him by a court. He was fined, the fine paid, and went into the Treasury of the United States. Congress passed a law ordering it to be repaid to him with interest. I have not been able to find the case, though I have the statute-book before me; but that is the fact. It is exceedingly difficult to find anything of the laws in the Statutes at Large. It is the worst book I ever saw.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am sorry that I cannot on this occasion agree with my friend from Connecticut, as I almost always do. I do not know that it is of any consequence; but I will tell him why I am going to vote for this bill. Commodore Jones, I believe, is the man who took the Peacock.

Mr. FOSTER. That was Jacob Jones.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This Commodore Jones, I will inform the Senator from Rhode Island, was the captain of the fleet of gun boats that defended the city of New Orleans in the war of 1812.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe I know them both; they are gallant men.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Undoubtedly. Commodore Jones was wounded in battle there.

Mr. SIMMONS. These men have done meritorious service. They have been deprived of their pay. They stand up to be shot at for our benefit. We do not mean to deprive them of their money. If they do not act properly in another capacity, we may censure them for that, but let us give them their pay. I do not think it is any reflection on the court. I think the proviso to the bill is very proper. When we come to pay a man, I do not want to reflect on those who judged him. This man places his claim on different grounds from those on which we can afford to place it. I place it on the ground that he is a gallant man; but he does not want to say that himself when he petitions here.

Mr. FOSTER. I said before, and repeat again, if the honorable Senator will move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a provision paying this amount to Commodore Jones for gallant services, and no more than this, I will vote for it with great cheerfulness.

Mr. SIMMONS. So far as I am concerned, I will agree to put in the preamble that he is a gallant man, and let the rest of the bill stand as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. STUART called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Broderick, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Slidell, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—11.
NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Iverson, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, Wilson, and Yulee—29.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BIGGS. I am unwilling that the vote shall be taken on this bill without stating, and I propose simply to state, the reasons which influence my own vote. I deeply regret that I cannot vote for it conscientiously on a principle involved in the bill. A court-martial of competent authority suspended Commodore Jones from his command for five years, and from his pay for two and a half of those years. A portion of that sentence, two and a half years suspension, was afterwards remitted by the President, and this bill is to allow to Commodore Jones two and a half years' pay as commodore; to allow him compensation as an officer, while he was suspended from command. I do not put it on the ground assumed by some gentlemen—I do not think the case presents that—that this is compensation for meritorious services, for gallant services as an officer. That is ignored by the bill itself. It cannot be put on the ground assumed by the Senator from Delaware, that the money has been paid into the Treasury and we have a right to pay it back; for, if I understand the case, during the time we now propose to pay him, he was not engaged in the public service at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must ask the Senator to suspend his remarks. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. BIGGS. I will not trespass on the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senate will, by unanimous consent, allow the vote to be taken.

Mr. BIGGS. I have no idea of interfering with the vote on the bill. I merely desire to put myself right, and regret that I am under the necessity of voting against the bill. I will not extend my remarks further. I hope the vote will be taken.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I do not often trespass on the patience of the Senate: I do so now from no personal inclination of my own. Indeed, but for the obligation which is imposed upon me by the people whom I represent, I would forego, on the present occasion, any suggestions which I might deem it proper to make, and give a silent vote upon the views which have been presented, and shall be presented, by other Senators, upon the question now pending. The importance of the question, however, is such as imposes an obligation upon me to speak in vindication of the rights of the people I represent. The magnitude of the question is a sufficient apology.

Since I have held a seat in this body, indeed in the history of the whole country, I think no question has been presented to us for our deliberation and consideration, equal in importance and magnitude to that which is now before us. I regret, sir, I deeply regret, the aspect in which it is presented. In all this body, were I to put the question, "how many are there who approve the act, which is about to be consummated here, in their judgment?" how many of all that hold seats here, could give an affirmative answer? The tyranny of party, the despotism of party, comes in to the rescue; and men here are about to do an act which in their judgment and in their hearts they disapprove. There is no despotism on earth like the despotism of party and party associations. I once felt its bonds, but thank God I am a freeman now.

What is the act which a firm and settled majority in this Senate have determined shall be done? In all the history of time, in all the records of the past, no act of equal political turpitude, in my judgment, can be found, save one to which I may allude.

Mr. President, I have no laudations to bestow on this Union. It needs none. Its eulogy is written in the history of the past. I choose that my acts shall speak for me, rather than the words I utter. I would, sir, that it should remain a monument forever to guide the nations of the world. I would, sir, that this Government should be perpetuated for all coming time; and no act of mine, no instrumentality of mine, shall be exerted or given except for that perpetuation. I would that our nation should stand a moral monument to enlighten other nations; but I cannot resist the conclusion that if we are to bow to the unlimited power of party despotism, if we are to do acts which in our judgments and in our hearts we reprobate, the day, the hour, of our downfall is as certain as that of other nations which have preceded us. I do not mean that it will come now, or even within my day, or the day of the youngest of us. Great as may be the wrongs which you may perpetrate, the recuperative energies of our country may overcome them; but, in the course of time, this incessant arrogation of executive and governmental power must produce its effect; and the institutions which we have reared, when their foundation shall have been subverted by executive power, must crumble and decay. That act which is before us, that bill upon which we are to vote, is one of the measures which is calculated, if not designed, to produce that event. Who that believes that nations, like individuals, must answer to a higher power for the wrongs they perpetrate—who that believes that the sins committed by a nation are to be answered for as are the sins of an individual—can doubt that, if the present course of things be persisted in, a fearful retribution must follow?

Mr. President, it is my purpose upon the present occasion to confine myself principally to a reply to the suggestions which have been made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND.] I may, after reviewing some of the remarkable doctrines which he has presented, say something on the question which is directly before us; but it is my object now to review some of the positions which he has assumed, for the purpose of testing their accuracy or their inaccuracy, and to answer some of the assaults which he has made upon the people I represent. The doctrines enunciated by that Senator are remarkable. The frankness with which they were expressed is commendable. It is my purpose to speak particularly to three distinct points: first, the faith of the South, and the manner in which she has kept it; second, the capacity of the South as a distinct and separate Government, as presented by the Senator from South Carolina; and third, the character of the people whom I represent—the laboring masses of the North. I may say incidentally something in relation to some other points which he suggested, but to these three points I propose mainly to confine myself. These points I propose to discuss, though I may not do so in the order in which I have named them.

First, as to the faith of the South. I will not stop to quote the Senator's language; but he asserts broadly that the North have uniformly violated their faith, but that we may rely with unlimited confidence upon the unbroken faith of the South. I have no answer to his allegation as to the faith of the North. When he shall make his specifications, I will give the answer that justice shall demand. On what point have we at the North been faithless to our constitutional obligations? Upon what point have we at the North been faithless to the South? Sir, when I speak of the South, I am only using the terms the Senator from South Carolina has placed in my mouth. In my heart, I know no North, no South, no East, no West. We are the people of one common country. Whatever relates to the prosperity and the welfare, whatever pertains to the rights of the South, as an American citizen, as an American Senator, I stand here to vindicate and maintain. What are their rights are my rights. What belongs to them belongs to me, as a citizen of a common country.

But the Senator from South Carolina has seen fit, in the course of the argument which he has pursued, to arraign the North for the want of fidelity, and has vaunted here the unbroken plighted faith of the South. I ask again, in what have we violated our constitutional obligations? I tell you, sir, you mistake us. We regard our country as a whole. We are willing to stand by it as a whole; nay, in the Union, we mean to stand by it as a whole. You can neither drive us out of it, nor shall you go.

But, sir, to proceed to the consideration of the points which I make. The facts of history show to my mind conclusively, that while we have been a Union, the faith of the South, of which the Senator from South Carolina so vauntingly boasted, has hardly been kept. I would not pursue this line of argument but for the manner in which the allegation was made. No single instance in which we of the North have violated our constitutional obligation has been cited. I think, in the absence of any specifications, I may clearly come to the conclusion that none can be successfully made. I hardly know what the Senator means by southern faith. I am therefore left to grope my way, and to draw my own conclusions.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina deplored the restoration of a tariff policy upon the South; but I think I may cite it as one class of cases in which the South has not kept its legislative faith to the North. Who were the authors of the tariff policy? From whom did it spring? Read the messages of Thomas Jefferson; read the messages of James Madison; quote the language, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] did yesterday, of the distinguished son of South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, and from all the records of the past we have the undisputed and indisputable history, that it was the South that tendered its aid to the North in what was called a protective policy. I am here no defender of that policy; I am here no advocate of a protective policy; but when the South had inaugurated such a policy, and had induced the North to invest its capital under a policy which itself had inaugurated, I ask—I think I may ask with triumph—with what kind of propriety can the South call on us now to change it? They hardly keep their legislative faith, when they seek to ruin the men who have invested their means under that system which they themselves have created. Is not that true? Is it not historically true? We of the North were a commercial people; we had no genial suns of the South to shine on our heads; we had no bright and stretching savannas that invited the cultivator of the soil. It was said, and said truly, that our country was cold and barren, though God knows we have made it "bloom and blossom as the rose." We had no natural advantages like those that God had given to the South. But placed as we were, and judging that the fiat of the Almighty was no curse upon man, that he should earn his livelihood in the sweat of his own brow, we have toiled on our hill-sides; we have gone into our machine-shops; we have delved in our mines; and we have made the North, under all the circumstances in which we have been placed, what she is. I insist that, when a policy which was calculated to divert the industry and the capital of the North from commercial to manufacturing purposes was inaugurated by the South, and after the capital of the North had been diverted to those sources, it was a want of legislative faith, on the part of the South, ruthlessly to break them down.

But, sir, the Senator complains again that the South have no guarantee that we shall not fasten on it a national bank; and that, too, comes from the Senator from South Carolina. Whose policy was that? Who imposed the system upon us? The Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, distinguished as the representative of that State, and as the exponent of the South, himself offered, in 1814, in the House of Representatives, a resolution to inquire into the expediency of incorporating a national bank; and then, in 1816, himself voted for it. If the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] was in his seat, I would ask him what guarantee have we that you will not turn back to the maxims that you first practiced, and again seek to impose upon us a national bank? I think I am right when I say that upon this side of the Senate, and among our friends in the country, there is no disposition to return to that system.

But, in relation to the system of protection to domestic industry or the manufacturing interest, let me say here, in passing, that while I am no prophet, I still predict, young as I am, or old as I am, that I shall live to see the day when the South will come into these Halls and clamor for protection. Why so? You are wearing out your lands in agriculture; you must go back to the manufacture of the articles that you consume for yourselves, your families, and those dependent upon you. It is one of the necessities of a nation; and as you depart from agriculture you will go to manufactures; you will come here to seek protection from the North, as well as protection from foreign Governments. I have no doubt that I shall live to see that day if I survive to the common age of man. If I do live to see it, and if I have power to exert, or a vote to give, I will give it for what is just and right to that people.

I pass from the consideration of these two questions to one of a broader character. I pass to the consideration of what was the original design of our Government in its foundation, and what was the action of the South at that period of time. I know the South has changed her views. I do not know that I complain of it. I know the effect of habit, association, companionship, and interest, upon the lives, the conduct, and the opinions of men. I can be more charitable to those men of the South than I can be to their allies in the North; and God forbid that I should say one word to or of them, when we have such a class existing in the North as we have all around us. No, sir; I might say that I love them in comparison with the class of men at the North who are faithless to all the instincts of humanity, of association, of education, and all their surroundings. I know the force and the power of those influences. God knows what might be our opinions if we were born and educated at the South; I do not. Had I been born in Turkey I do not know that I might not have been a Mussulman. But it is humiliating to us, it is mortifying, but it is an admission to be made, that you train our politicians at the North, and make them subservient to all your behests. It is a humiliating admission to make, but still it belongs to the frailty of humanity, and I hope, in the progress of time, we shall be compensated for the admission by finding, when the Government is restored to its original position, that that class of people do not live entirely at the North. While it is a matter of regret, and of deep regret, that we have such a class of men among us, while I mourn over it, I am consoled with the reflection that light is dawning in the distant South; that the patriotic, the noble men of that region are coming to the rescue, and telling us that they have hearts and sympathies that beat in unison with our own, and that they, with us, ask only that this Government shall be administered upon the principles on which our fathers founded it.

But, sir, what was the early action of the Government to which I have referred and upon which our Government was based? It was the principle of freedom. I know too well, and I confess I feel somewhat embarrassed under the circumstances, that I can utter no new truth here; but what, I ask, is the history of this Government in relation to the principles upon which it was founded? I say that it was founded, and it was designed to be based, on the principles of free government. When our Constitution was formed, nobody doubted, everybody expected, that the institution of slavery, so deleterious in its effects, would fade away. Times have changed. The invention of the cotton-gin made the production of cotton profitable; and, with that power which belongs to the pocket-nerve, public sentiment has changed in the South, and too much in the North. The production of cotton became profitable, and with that profit came the change. A temporary and evanescent benefit has led to this change, not a permanent benefit. Madison told us in the convention which framed the Constitution, that it was wrong to admit that man could hold property in man; that he would not incorporate that idea into the Constitution. We had the maxims and the teachings of Jefferson and all the wisest and best statesmen of the South against slavery. I have no time to stop now to quote authorities. They are

"Thick as autumnal leaves."

They all concurred in the doctrine that it was an institution that carried along with it blight and mildew; and your eloquent Pinckney, of Maryland, told you that it scorched the green earth upon which its footsteps fell.

Under that view of the case, the ordinance from the brain of Thomas Jefferson was adopted. In the precise form in which it passed into a legal enactment, I know it came from Nathan Dane, of New England; but the idea was that of the South; the principle was originated by Thomas Jefferson; and the only distinction between the restriction of Jefferson in 1784 and Dane in 1787 was this: Jefferson proposed that slavery should be prohibited from all your territories then belonging to the United States, and all that should be acquired. The proviso of Dane restricted it in the territories then belonging to the United States, and provided that fugitives from service should be surrendered. If the doctrines of Jefferson had been maintained as presented in 1784, there would have been quiet in the country, and none of the agitations which we have witnessed would have occurred.

This was the doctrine of the South, then; she presented it to us for our approval and our adoption. How stands the South to-day? She has repudiated the doctrines of her fathers, and comes here asserting that our Government is founded on the great principle of human servitude—a system that degrades the white man who labors beside the slave. Who have kept their faith? "The South has never violated its faith; we can repose on that faith which has never been violated," we are told by the Senator from South Carolina. But, sir, as I travel along in this record, I want to bring it home a little more direct to South Carolina. I say, up to 1841, South Carolina had recognized these positions. In 1841 what had been the long practice of the Government was not only recognized but indorsed by South Carolina, and through her own distinguished Senator on this floor, Mr. Calhoun. We all remember what was the position which that State had assumed prior to that period of time. They had gone off and worshiped false gods. They had attempted to inculcate the doctrine of nullification; but when Mr. Van Buren was elected President of the United States they gave to him their adhesion; and upon what ground? Upon the ground that he had pursued a policy which was satisfactory to the South—a policy which recognized the rights of the South.

What was the history of the time? Mr. Van Buren had addressed a letter, preceding his election, to citizens of North Carolina, which I have by me, in which he laid down the doctrine that it was inexpedient to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and that it ought not to be done without the consent of the slaveholders; but that the power of the United States over the District of Columbia was precisely that which originally belonged to Virginia and Maryland. Mr. Van Buren, in his inaugural address—I will not quote his language—declared that he would not approve any bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, without ample remuneration to the slaveholders, and that the Government of the United States had no power over slavery in the States. That is the doctrine of Mr. Van Buren, and upon that doctrine South Carolina comes into the Senate and gives to him an earnest and a generous support. The doctrines of nullification were forgotten. Mr. Preston, who was then a member of the Senate, I think, did not quite come up to the progress of South Carolina in these events; and in the resolutions which the Senate of South Carolina saw fit to adopt on that occasion, they applauded John C. Calhoun; they had no words of approval for William C. Preston. I will read one of the resolutions adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina, in 1841:

"Resolved, That the general principles and policy of the administration of Martin Van Buren are approved by this Legislature, and are well calculated to preserve the perpetuity of the Union, by an equal and just protection of the rights of every section; thus avoiding the necessity of any State resorting to her own means of self-defense, to secure unimpaired her institutions and her rights."

Now, what is the fair deduction to be drawn from the language used by Mr. Van Buren, to which I have alluded? He denied that the Government of the United States had any right to interfere with slavery in the States: so say we all. He denied the expediency of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, except by the consent of the slaveholders, and compensation made.

Now, by fair deduction, will any lawyer say that he did not hold to the power to abolish slavery in this District? His own language is before me, in his answer to the letter to which I have alluded, that it was not expedient to do the thing. Consequently, I say that we cannot avoid the conclusion that he held to the power. He held, also, that Congress had no power to interfere with slavery in the States; so we hold; but he is perfectly silent in relation to the power of Congress in the Territories. The inclusion of the power named is the exclusion of the power not named. Is it not a matter of fair inference, is it not an inference from which we cannot escape, that while he undertakes to limit the power of Congress, and to prohibit it in the States, we have a right to exercise it in the Territories, taking along with it the fact that for more than sixty years that power has uniformly been exercised? I think it is irresistible.

Here, then, if I am right in my conclusions, is the indorsement of the sovereign State, as it is sometimes called, of South Carolina, approving of the Administration of Mr. Van Buren, whose policy was clear and distinct, to wit: that we should not interfere with slavery in the States; that we should not abolish slavery in the District of Columbia without the consent of the slaveholders; but that we had the same power to do it that Virginia and Maryland had; and leaving irresistibly the conclusion that we had a right to exercise our power over the Territories of the country. In 1841, then, the State of South Carolina comes up to a recognition of the doctrines that we demand. Now we are told by the Senator from that State that the plighted faith of the South has never been broken.

Mr. President, I come now to another point which, in my judgment, implies vastly more than legislative faith. I come to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Whose measure was that? From what section of the country did it come? By whose votes was it imposed upon the country? Every man knows—it is historical—that the Missouri compromise was a southern measure. Its passage was celebrated by public meetings all over the South. They held it as their peculiar measure. It was, in truth, the suggestion of Mr. McLane, from a southern State; and it was adopted finally upon the suggestion of Mr. Pinckney, a Senator from a southern State. His life shows the fact. The letter which he wrote upon the occasion states that, in the committee of conference between the two branches of Congress, he suggested it. Upon his suggestion it was adopted; and then public meetings were held through all the South, and they were jubilant over its success. Now, sir, one of their own men declared that it should be an act irrepealable. I do not contend that it was such except in good faith. The Missouri compromise line was, therefore, the act of the South; and in that act the North had always acquiesced. Who abrogated the restriction? It was adopted by almost all the votes of the South; and only here and there a man from the North to support it, and who were known no more forever, as will be those at the North who support this measure. It was a southern measure in essence and in substance. The North did not vote for it. Why? Because it was a partial departure from the original design of the Government; because it did not come up to the doctrine of 1787. But after it had been adopted the North, for more than a third of a century, acquiesced in it. After the South had secured, under that compromise, all the advantage that could accrue to her and her peculiar institutions, she comes into this Hall, and she asks, she demands, and she obtains, a repeal of all that was beneficial to the North. We are told by the Senator from South Carolina that we can rely upon the South; that her plighted faith has never been broken! Sir, I will not quote what is so familiar upon my lips in relation to the South, but I will quote it as to what they call the Democratic party: "their faith is Panic, and branded to a proverb."

But, sir, it is not in a party aspect alone that I propose to view this question. A broader and a wider view is before me. It is not the South as a party, and in a party aspect, that has violated this time-honored compact, and I say has violated her faith; but she has extended her power to the court below. I think, on the whole, "the court below" is an appropriate term. She seized upon the Executive and bound him in her manacles. She holds the Government in all its departments. You have got the legislative power in your control; you have got the executive in your control; you have got the judiciary in your power. How you got the two latter I do not precisely undertake to say—by political complicity and collusion anyhow. Search all the records of your country, examine all the messages that have ever been presented to us, and not one can be found where an Executive has undertaken to foreshadow the opinions of the judiciary, until you come to the inaugural address of the present President of the United States—not one; and in that political collusion and complicity, I affirm that the object was to rob the people and the States of the rights that belong to them.

Now, sir, with how much grace, or with how much truth, can the Senator from South Carolina affirm that the plighted faith of the South has never been broken? This opinion of the court—mark the word I use; I do not call it the decision of the court, for I regard it only as the opinion of the judges individually—is given upon a question which they tell us gravely is not before them. They erect a structure for which they have no foundation. They gravely and judicially tell us that they have no jurisdiction of the matter, and then they volunteer an opinion as to what they would decide, if the question was before them. That is all there is of it; there is nothing more. I concur with Justice McLean, who said that he would treat it as no decision at all. There is not a lawyer in this body, there is not a lawyer in the country, who does not know that when the court determine that they have no jurisdiction in the matter, they have no right to determine the question which lies behind the issue of jurisdiction. I regret, sir, I deeply regret, that that court should have gone outside of its appropriate jurisdiction for the purpose of seeking an occasion on which to issue or make public their private opinions. I had before looked at that court with high respect; but I hold that they had no more right to decide upon that question than we have to decide for them. It was a political question purely; and it is one of those questions, in regard to which Thomas Jefferson so early and so ably warned us against judicial interference. But why quote Thomas Jefferson? He is obsolete on the other side of the Chamber.

They had no more authority to decide a political question for us, than we had to decide a judicial question for them. Keep each branch of the Government within the sphere of its own duties. We make laws, they interpret them; but it is not for them to tell us what are the limits within which we shall confine ourselves in our action; or, in other words, what is a political constitutional right of this body, any more than it is for us to tell them what is a judicial right that belongs to them. Of all despotisms upon earth, the despotism of a judiciary is the worst. It is a life estate. When that court shall make the decision foreshadowed in this opinion, they will be regarded on the pages of history as exceeding in infamy the famed Jeffreys, of England. His decisions did not undertake to grasp the liberties of a people, but were confined to individuals. Our court, broader in their grasp, undertake to usurp the rights of a nation. Jeffreys will be forgotten when the opinions of this court shall have grown into a judicial decision. Sir, that will never be. There is a peculiar fact that belongs to that court: I have been unable to find a decision contravening the party in power. While I am no prophet, I can read when "coming events cast their shadows before." We are to have the power; we are to restore the Government to what our fathers made it; we are to place it upon its original basis; and the court will come back to the original basis.

When Texas was admitted into this Union, I was a member of the other House of Congress. I think I have a just appreciation of the influences that operated at that time. I see other men here, not members of this body, who, if they could speak, I am satisfied would corroborate what I am about to say. Texas was admitted by no vote of mine. I was willing to admit her; I so stated; but I wanted a fair compromise between the North and the South. I wanted a just and equitable division of that territory. We had adopted the Missouri compromise of 1820 as an equitable division of the territory acquired from France. I was willing to admit Texas upon the same basis. I voted for a line which made a fair and equitable division of that territory. There were some thirty or forty or fifty—I do not remember precisely how many—of the members from the North who went for it. The South laughed us to scorn. Texas was admitted, and it was admitted upon the basis of the Missouri compromise line. The territory which we acquired from France, known as the Louisiana Territory, embraced a certain area. Congress in its wisdom saw fit to run a line through it on the parallel of $36^{\circ} 30'$ as a fair division of that territory. Was it a fair division of another territory which might lie all south of that line? An arbitrary line, as a matter of just equity between the parties, could not apply to different territories. We of the North asked only that there should be a just, a fair, and equitable distribution, and we would go for it. They would not give it to us, and we went against the measure; but Texas was admitted, and it was admitted upon the basis of the Missouri compromise; and without it, I affirm here to-day, it could not have been admitted. That line as a compromise was offered. The amendment which finally prevailed in the House of Representatives, was offered by Mr. Brown, of Tennessee. He incorporated into that amendment, I think at the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that all the Territory of Texas lying north of the parallel of $36^{\circ} 30'$ should be admitted as free States, and all south as slave States. Then we were told, gravely told, that north of that line we could have two free States, while south of it there would be three slave States. On that basis it was introduced, and the bill was passed. What is the state of the case to-day? In 1854 you obliterated every right which the North had to secure free States north of that line, and you come up here to-day and tell us that slavery is the basis of this Government, and while it remains a Territory (citing the opinion of the court) we have no right by act of Congress to exclude slavery, or to authorize the people of a Territory to exclude slavery.

Was it good faith—ay, sir, far above legislative faith—was it good faith on the part of the South having asked of the North to admit Texas in that way, (Mr. Calhoun, in his famous letter to Mr. King, then our Minister at the Court of France, affirming that it was done for the sole purpose of securing the interests of slavery,) to obliterate that line which you said gave us two free States? You did it by the act of 1854. I do not deny that the act of 1820 was legislatively repealable; but there is a sense of honor, there is a sense of right, there is a sense of propriety, that ought to govern men, which ought to rise superior to the mere exercise of power. You repealed that line, and for what purpose did you repeal it? I may discuss that proposition in another branch of the suggestions which I propose to make. You repealed it for the sole purpose of extending human slavery. I do not mean to accuse Senators individually with that motive. I mean to speak of public acts; and I form my opinion of those public acts from that which is their necessary and inevitable result. The faith of the North has never been broken; where are your specifications? The faith of the South is inviolate; has always been kept! So says the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, in all parties there is some particular interest that controls their action. In other words, while party associations are formed, there is in the association, whatever it may be, a controlling influence and direction to that party as it exists. What are the influences that control what is called the Democratic party—I say called—yes, sir, called; and it is a burlesque indeed to speak of that party which controls upon the other side of the Chamber, as a Democratic party. It adopts none of the maxims of Democracy, none of the maxims which we suppose belong to a Democratic party—a free Government, a liberal Government, in which the rights of the people are to be paramount. No, sir, it does no such thing; and it is therefore a burlesque. Besides, it is a party in the leading-strings of its old political opponents. Here is the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] whose social relations with myself are, I think, kind, at least; there is the Senator from Georgia, who sits on his right, [Mr. TOOMBS]—old, tried, and trained warriors in the Whig party, when there was a Whig party, able and eloquent. What you call the Democratic party to-day in this Senate is under their lead. The other side of the Chamber bows to their behests, and well it may. They are the brains, as well as the eloquence of the party. Go to the other Chamber, and you will find the distinguished member from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and another member from North Carolina no less distinguished, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] as the leaders of modern Democracy there. Trained in the school of the ancient Whig party, they come up each as an Ajax Telamon of modern Democracy. Indeed the Senator from Georgia says that the Whigs at the South, with generosity, came in, in great numbers, to the support of the Democratic party. I repeat that it is a burlesque; it is supremely ridiculous to talk about a Democratic party as being the present organization of a party known by that name. What is it? That is my purpose to show. It is, I think, clear and demonstrable that the Democratic party to-day is the embodiment, the refinement of what comes from South Carolina.

All parties, I have said, are directed more or less by certain influences within their organization. The Democratic party, so called, is in the control of South Carolina. I remember when Mr. Calhoun offered his resolutions here, only a few years ago, in relation to the powers of Government over slavery in the Territories—I refer to the resolutions which he offered about the days of the compromise. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] remembers how they were laughed and scouted from the Senate. They are in the Senate to-day; they are the basis of your Democratic party; they are now triumphant in every branch of the Government; they are triumphant here; they are triumphant in the other branch of Congress, one of its very worthy and distinguished members being its Presiding Officer. They are here by your action, and you fasten your power upon the Executive at the other end of the avenue. Democracy in 1858 means the nullification doctrines of South Carolina in times gone by. It is so. I say you have the Senate, and you have the Congress. I have no earthly doubt as to what is to be the fate of this measure in this branch of the Government. I have no doubt as to what will be its fate in the other House. I affirm, therefore, that you have got this branch of the Government. That you have the Executive is clear. While he told his subordinate, the Governor of Kansas, that he must insist upon the submission of the Lecompton constitution to the people for their vote of approval or rejection, he has yielded all, and tells you now that you must adopt the constitution, notwithstanding there is ten thousand majority against it. You have the Supreme Court, because they say in their opinion that—

“For more than a century before the adoption of the Constitution they had regarded negroes as beings of an inferior order, and possessed of no rights”—

mark the words—

—“which a white man was bound to respect.”

Is there a beast that toils in any State—I speak of beasts—where legislation has not thrown around it a protecting care that it shall not be abused by its owner? Is there a slave State where slavery exists intensified, where your Legislature have not protected the rights of person in the slave? It is an inhuman expression. It is historically untrue besides.

But, sir, what you call the Democracy have improved upon that doctrine. If you pass this bill, (and who doubts that you will?) they come to the same conclusion; and they go further; for, while the court decide that colored men have no rights that you are bound to respect, they affirm that majorities of white men in the Territories have no rights that the Democratic party are bound to respect. That is the conclusion. It is the logical conclusion from your acts. The court, I thought, went a great way. It is a revolting—I repeat once more—it is an inhuman expression. They said that was the sentiment of the revolutionary times; I mean to quote them correctly. I say it is historically incorrect. But improving on that doctrine, that black men, for a century before the Constitution, had no rights that a white man was bound to respect, modern Democracy claims that a majority of free white men in your Territories have no rights that it is bound to respect.

Mr. DURKEE. That is the doctrine of progress?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the doctrine of progress, as my friend says. Yes, sir, it is the doctrine of progress; but such a progress! I think it is that kind of progress that the boy made in going to his daily toils at school. There had been snow and rain, and the ground was very slippery, and he arrived at a very late hour. On being reprimanded by his instructor for not getting there earlier, he said that on taking a step forward he always fell two steps behind. “Then pray, sir, how did you ever arrive?” “Why, after struggling a long while I turned around and went backwards.” [Laughter.]

This doctrine, I think, is modern Democracy, intensified and explained by the Senator from South Carolina. I pass now to the discussion of another position which he has assumed. He told us, “the poor ye always have with you.” That is true; there is no denial of the fact. There is, however, another maxim of the same good book, which he might have quoted with just as much propriety, and just as great truth: “Do ye unto others as ye would that others should do unto you, for this is the law and the prophets.” Does poverty imply crime? Does poverty imply servitude? Does poverty imply slavery? I join issue with the Senator there. In all climes, in all countries, and in all ages, there are poor. Because men are poor, does that imply that they are to be placed on the same basis with persons who are subjugated, and who toil in the chains of slavery? I deny it. There is a prompting of the heart, there is a principle of Christian benevolence, that tells you, and tells me, and tells us all, that if there are poor, it is our duty to alleviate their poverty, and to remove their distress—not, because they are poor, to class them in the same condition with negro slaves. I grant that poverty necessarily produces a greater degree of dependence of the poor upon other classes, than would exist in another state of circumstances; but because a man is poor, does that discharge you from the obligations which you owe to him as a fellow-citizen? Because he is poor, does that relieve you from the obligation which you owe to him as a citizen of the community, and as a Christian? Surely not; and that dependence does not create slavery. Look over the world, and you find that poverty is produced from a variety of circumstances. It may be by misfortune; generally, I think, by improvidence. It may be by devastating elements. It may be by causes over which the individual has no control. No matter what are the causes, if they operate upon the individual he is entitled to your sympathies and to your Christian benevolence; and God forbid that you should class him with the slave that toils only to live, and lives only to toil. It may be, sir, that the influence of slavery is calculated, if not designed, to produce that state of things; but if its tendencies are to produce that state of things, still, to place the poor on the same basis with the negro slave, who does not own himself, is unjust and illogical.

But, sir, while the Senator charges us with having, in all our large cities, a very considerable number of persons who obtain alms from beggary; while he asserts that there are more paupers in the streets of New York than are to be found in the whole South; still, is it not true that in all cities, in all large places, you witness always the trappings of wealth, and that misery which is incident to poverty? Is it not as true of the South as of the North? While we have large hordes of that class of men in the great cities of the North, is it not true that vast portions of them come even from the South, and congregate there and ask alms at our hands?

It is true “the poor ye always have with you.” It is the fiat of the Almighty. You have them at the South, we have them at the North. I do not believe that in the North, outside of our cities, and exclusive of those who come from foreign countries, and who are poured out upon us to some extent from foreign alms-houses and prisons, there is among our people as much of poverty as there is in the South. What are the facts in relation to this matter? I have very little personal knowledge as to the state of things in the South, but I choose to quote the authority of some southern men for the purpose of showing what is the condition of their poor. I think I am justified in doing it. Go abroad amidst our rural population, and you will find that to the great mass of our people beggars are unknown. We have them not, and we know them not. That we have objects of charity, when a devastating element may sweep away the productions of years from our neighbors and our friends—that we have such cases, where we ought to bestow, and do bestow our alms, I do not deny; but in the great mass of our countrymen among our rural population, beggary is unknown, and of those who congregate in our large cities, a fair proportion is from your own section.

I propose to read a few extracts, and among others one from a speech of the Senator from South Carolina himself, in relation to the condition of your poor at the South. I shall read first an extract from a production of Mr. William Gregg, of Charleston, South Carolina, a gentleman of whom I know nothing except that I understand him to be a man of respectability, and entitled to confidence. He says:

"From the best estimates that I have been able to make, I put down the white people who ought to work and who do not, or who are so employed as to be wholly unproductive to the State, at one hundred and twenty-five thousand."

"Any man who is an observer of things could hardly pass through our country without being struck with the fact that all the capital, enterprise, and intelligence is employed in directing slave labor; and the consequence is, that a large portion of our poor white people are wholly neglected, and are suffered to while away an existence in a state but one step in advance of the Indian of the forest."

I shall read next an extract from an address of the Senator from South Carolina himself, delivered before the South Carolina Institute, in 1850. On that occasion, speaking of the poor whites of the South, he used this language:

"They obtain a precarious subsistence by occasional jobs, by hunting, by fishing, by plundering fields or folds, and too often by what is in its effects far worse—trading with slaves, and seducing them to plunder for their benefit."

I shall read next an extract from the Review of Mr. De Bow, a man earnestly devoted to southern institutions, and, I think it may be said with truth, who publishes a periodical which is designed and calculated to advance and promote their interests. Speaking of the labor of the South, and the effect that would be produced by the establishment of manufactures, he says:

"A demand for labor in such establishments is all that is necessary to raise this class from want and beggary and (too frequently) moral degradation, to a state of comfort, comparative independence, and moral and social respectability. Besides this, thousands of such would naturally come together as residents in manufacturing villages, where, with very little trouble and expense, they might receive a common-school education, instead of growing up in profound ignorance."

"The superior grades of female labor may be considered such as imply a necessity for education on the part of the employée, while the menial class is generally regarded as of the lowest; and in a slave State, this standard is 'in the lowest depths, a lower deep,' from the fact that, by association, it is a reduction of the white servant to the level of their colored fellow-menials."

I doubt not the truth of that remark. Whatever may be our obligations to all mankind; whatever in truth and principle may be demanded of us toward all races, there ought at least to be in our hearts something that shall respond to the wants of our own Caucasian race. If we have no sympathy; if we have no feeling whatever for other races, we may be pardoned, at least, if we would honestly incorporate and advance in our Government that system which will elevate our own race. How degraded they are, how low they are, is to be judged only of the men whom you see when brought into competition with that very class of men. But, sir, I will read other extracts. I read from the Virginia Dispatch, a paper published at Richmond, Virginia:

"We will only suppose that the ready-made shoes imported into this city from the North, and sold here, were manufactured in Richmond. What a great addition it would be to the means of employment! How many boys and females would find the means of earning their bread, who are now suffering for a regular supply of the necessities of life!"

"The poor ye have always with you." Are the poor confined to the North? I have read authorities from southern men. I have read only from those whom I presume to be conversant with the condition of the white men who toil there, and I cannot resist the conclusion that the Senator from South Carolina has drawn his ideas of our laborers from what he sees at home. Sir, whatever may be our poverty, I think I can affirm here to-day, that for all the great and noble enterprises, for all the benevolence which distinguishes man, Boston alone contributes more annually than all the South

But I pass from the consideration of that question to still another presented by the Senator from South Carolina, and I may add, perhaps, that it is a question upon which I feel more keenly than upon any other. I pass to the consideration of that point which he has raised in relation to the character of the laborers of the North. I do not believe, with that frankness which has marked all that the Senator has said, that he has designed to rise here and utter a libel upon our working and laboring men. No, sir; I believe he has drawn his conclusions from what he has seen at home, and I do not know but that he has drawn some conclusions from the servility he has witnessed here. If he has, I desire to disabuse the Senator of what I think are his erroneous premises, and consequently, his erroneous conclusions. I want to do the Senator no injustice; surely I will not; and to be certain that I do him no injustice, I will send to the Secretary and ask him to read some paragraphs from what I suppose is the corrected speech of the Senator, commencing at the last paragraph on page 13 of the pamphlet, and concluding on page 15.

The Secretary read as follows:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is a class requiring but a low order of intellect and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air as to build either the one or the other except on this mud-sill. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand—a race inferior to her own, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for our purpose, and call them slaves. We found them slaves by the 'common consent of mankind,' which, according to Cicero, 'lex natura est,' the highest proof of what is Nature's law. We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by 'ears polite'; I will not characterize that class at the North with that term; but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal."

"The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; all the powers of the earth cannot abolish that. God only can do it when he repeals the fiat, 'the poor ye always have with you.' For the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market, and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole class of manual laborers and 'operatives,' as you call them, are essentially slaves."

Mr. HAMMOND. I beg leave to interpolate a word at this point. This speech was corrected very hastily, and on looking over it I have made some other corrections. I wish to insert the word "hiring" in the clause which has just been read, so that it shall read: "Your whole class of hiring manual laborers and 'operatives,' as you call them, are essentially slaves."

The Secretary continued to read the extract from Mr. HAMMOND's speech as follows:

"The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most painful manner, at any hour in any street in any of your large towns. Why, you meet more beggars in one day, in any single street of the city of New York, than you would meet in a lifetime in the whole South. We do not think that whites should be slaves either by law or necessity. Our slaves are black, of another and inferior race. The status in which we have placed them is an elevation. They are elevated from the condition in which God first created them, by being made our slaves. None of that race on the whole face of the globe can be compared with the slaves of the South. They are happy, content, unassuming, and utterly incapable, from intellectual weakness, ever to give us any trouble by their aspirations. Yours are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than 'an army with banners,' and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your government overthrown, your property divided, not as they have mistakenly attempted to initiate such proceedings by meeting in parks, with arms in their hands, but by the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very hearthstones. How would you like for us to send lecturers and agitators North, to teach these people this, to aid in combining, and to lead them?"

Mr. HAMLIN. I accept the modification which the Senator from South Carolina proposes to make. It is but just; it is but fair to allow it. I know very well that, in a discussion here, we may use a term which does not express precisely the meaning we intend. It is just and fair that every Senator should have the opportunity of stating precisely, and in the most accurate language, what he does mean. I do not see, however, that the modification which the Senator has seen fit to make substantially changes the position which he assumed in his speech.

In my judgment the Senator from South Carolina—I assure him I say it in kindness—has mistaken the character of our laborers and their position. I do not think he would designedly assign to them a position to which they do not belong; and I have said that, in my opinion, he has come to the conclusion that our laborers occupy precisely the same position as those whom he sees in his own vicinity. I do not say that even that is so, but I say such is my conclusion. I am frank to admit that I know very little of the character of the laborers who toil beside the slave, but I have seen something of it. I have seen what has satisfied me that they have little intelligence; that they were poorly clothed; and that, while they felt themselves above them, they were actually in the social scale below the slaves. I remember, sir, that upon the banks of the Potomac I once heard a negro taunt a white man that he was so poor that he had not a master; and when I looked at the poor white man I confess that I thought there was some truth in the taunt of the negro.

Now, my word for it, the Senator from South Carolina has mistaken the character of our population and our laborers. I stand here the representative of northern laborers. In my own person I present a laboring man—educated at the printing case, toiling in my field, and earning with my own hands, and by the sweat of my own brow, the food on which I subsist; and I am glad to say that here sits beside me a worthy compeer, [Mr. WILSON.] It may be regarded as egotistical, and if so, I ask you to pardon me; but I think I feel something for the man that labors. I think I have something in my heart that leads me to sympathize with him. I know that my friend from Massachusetts has. From our boyhood to our manhood we have toiled in the sunshine and in the rain, and we are, though poor ones, the representatives of the men who labor at the North. I wish they had better and abler representatives here; but such as we are, they have sent us here; such as we are, we will vindicate their rights.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that it was agreed yesterday that the Senate would go into executive session to-day at three o'clock; that hour has now arrived, and as my colleague will, perhaps, occupy another hour, I suppose he may as well defer his remarks until to-morrow. I move, therefore, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["Four o'clock was the hour."]

Mr. FOOT. I was present, and I suppose I shall have the concurrence of all the members who were present at the adjournment yesterday afternoon, that it was understood and made a special order that the Senate would, at three o'clock to-day, proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FITCH. My recollection is not precise as to the hour; but my impression is, that the executive session was to be at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FOOT. Three o'clock was finally named, and agreed to generally.

Several Senators. Four o'clock.

Mr. YULEE. I understood four o'clock to be the hour, and it was understood that before that time the Senator from Maine, and, probably, another gentleman, would address the Senate.

Mr. FOOT. Three o'clock was finally proposed and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion of Mr. FESSENDEN was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent thereon the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, March 9, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Jabez Fox.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill No. 313, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers, on which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] was entitled to the floor.

EXCUSED FROM SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield me the floor for a moment. I understood, from the reading of the Journal yesterday, that I was appointed to serve on the Matteson special committee. I hope that the House will excuse me from serving on the committee.

The question was put, and agreed to.

PROPOSITIONS TO INTRODUCE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield me the floor that I may introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope that by unanimous consent, half an hour's time may be set apart for the introduction of bills of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. CLINGMAN. For the introduction of bills and resolutions.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is a very great press for the floor in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I am anxious that we should go into committee as soon as possible, so that gentlemen may proceed with discussion there. I would be very glad if my friend from Virginia would allow me to move to suspend the rules, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. QUITMAN. I object to everything except the regular order of business.

Mr. HARLAN. I am very anxious that States should be called for bills and resolutions. If that be consented to, I have no objection; but I do object to this process of individual members having special privileges.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of their assistant clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 91) to continue a pension to Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, United States Army;

An act (S. No. 111) to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont;

An act (S. No. 173) for the relief of Mary Peters;

An act (S. No. 185) for the relief of Anna M. E. King, Louisa M. King, Cordelia E. King, and Sarah J. DeLaunoy; and

An act (S. No. 122) for the relief of Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

BILL TO RAISE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. FAULKNER. It would at any time, and under any circumstances, be a matter of regret to me to find myself compelled to differ on a question of military policy with the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] and with that committee over which he has the honor to preside, and of which we are both members. It is especially so at this juncture when I believe that the necessities of the public service demand some increase of our military force, when I observe not only the apathy, but, I might almost say, the aversion, that has been shown by Congress, to yield to these necessities of the public service, and when it becomes all who believe that the interest and honor of the country demand some increase of the military establishment, should harmonize their views, and not frustrate a common object by divisions among ourselves. I say, therefore, sir, that if I could conscientiously support the bill that has been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, I would do so; but I cannot give it my support. I do not believe, sir, that this bill comes up to the full ideas of the chairman of that committee of what the interests of the country at this juncture demand. I am very certain that there are at least some members of that committee who cast the weight of their influence in favor of the recommendations of that committee, and in opposition to the opposing scheme of policy, who will be found, upon this floor, when they come to record their votes, as hostile to the one as they were to the other.

Sir, I believe that the interests of our public service at this time demand an increase of our military force. In all that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] has said upon that aspect of the question, I entirely concur, as I do in the view that there is no power vested in the President of the United States, under the act of 1795, at all adequate to the present emergency in our affairs. But, sir, I dissent wholly from that gentleman in the conclusion which he has announced to this House, that the description of force, which is neither regular nor militia, but which partakes of some of the qualities of both—the volunteer—is the description of force which is most proper for our present service.

Mr. Speaker, I do not stand here to make any disparaging reflection upon the volunteers. My knowledge of them, and my own feelings would forbid such a course. The annals of our country have been too often illustrated by their valor and their patriotism, and, I will say, by their efficient action in the field, to justify me in any general denunciation of them as an occasional resort of our military policy. For the purpose of national defense they are invaluable. They have intelligence, patriotism, spirit, and ardor. For a quick, brilliant, rapid campaign, they surpass any other description of force. Yet, sir, they are liable to all the objections which, in the very nature of things, must apply to an untrained, undisciplined, inexperienced soldiery. There are exigencies of war to which the volunteer is the best adapted. There are other exigencies to which he is not suited; and there, sir, is the point of separation between the gentleman from Mississippi and myself. I do not regard the volunteer as the proper description of force for the exigency which has now arisen in the Territory of Utah. I do not look upon him as the proper force to send to that Territory. I think that no untrained, undisciplined, inexperienced soldiery should be sent there. It never was designed or purposed, in my conception of things, that volunteers should be sent on such service as that now contemplated in that Territory.

No military authority in this country has called upon you for a volunteer force; and I much question whether, if you place them at the disposal of the Executive, he will find use or occasion for them. Nay, sir; I may hazard the opinion, perhaps, with diffidence, that the prominence which the idea of volunteers now has in this country and before Congress, is to be ascribed more to some outside popular pressure than to the dictates of a sound military policy.

Sir, I believe that the exigencies of the country require the addition of five regiments to your regular Army. I presented that proposition to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am sorry to say it there met but little favor or encouragement. I am still of that opinion, though I am disposed, in deference to the views that have been expressed in the other branch of Congress, so far, at least, to modify my proposition as to bring it within the range of its possible passage by Congress. I know some gentlemen will say that we should legislate without reference to the views and action of a coordinate branch of the legislature. I admit, that in every question involving principle, we should do so; but, in mere matters of expediency I am not prepared to assert that such a position is proper. I go for something practicable. I go for that which is the best I can get under the circumstances. I find that body has voted down the five-regiment bill. I find that it has, with almost equal unanimity, voted down the volunteer bill. I have therefore sought to obtain some proposition that might combine and harmonize the views of those who believe that some increase of the present military force of the country is necessary.

But, sir, I mean to throw upon this body its proper responsibility in regard to that measure. I shall bring forward that bill, and I shall ask this body to vote upon the recommendation of the Executive in regard to the five additional regiments. If that is voted down, I will then ask that the bill which I have presented, and which has been printed, may be adopted as a substitute for the bill presented by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, there is a very extensive misconception as to the true actual strength of our Army. That misconception arises from confounding the authorized strength of the Army with its actual real strength, and from a failure to consider the large size of our staffs which, under an idea suggested by Mr. Calhoun, is adapted for an army of greater magnitude than any we may expect shortly to have.

Sir, the authorized strength of our Army is seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four men. Its actual strength is fifteen thousand seven hundred. From these you are to deduct the staff, embracing a large number of ordnance men, and the result is an actual strength of thirteen thousand five hundred and seventy-five men. If you deduct from that number those who, according to the statistics of the sanitary condition of our Army, are unfit for active service, you will have left less than thirteen thousand men for all the purposes for which we want this force in the field.

Now, sir, what is the field of operation of this little Army of thirteen thousand men? What are the duties which are imposed upon them? They are scattered over an area of three million square miles. It is a military police upon which you depend to guard your two Indian frontiers, the one extending east of the Rocky Mountains, from the Lake of the Woods to the Rio Grande; and the other extending on the western slope of those mountains, from the British possessions on the north to the Gulf of California, embracing within that limit, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, two hundred and forty-three thousand hostile Indians, or those who, at any moment, may become such, and who are in a condition and temper of feelings to become such, whenever any prospect of advantage may tempt them to aggression.

This force is also your military police to guard your line of communications between the Pacific ocean and the Mississippi valley, covering something like nine thousand miles of emigrant route. It is scattered among one hundred and thirty-eight military forts and posts, there being little more than one company to each military post, and not one soldier to two miles of your emigrant and frontier routes. And yet, sir, this is the Army which we are told is too large, and which has swelled beyond the necessities of the nation. Sir, is this Army kept in idleness? Does this Army consume the substance of the people without affording an equivalent in service? What are we told by those who have some right and some authority to speak upon a question of this kind? Winfield Scott, who has not only achieved for himself a reputation as the first captain of the age, but who has, by his whole life, shown his capacity to estimate and a heart to feel for his compatriot in arms—what does he say? Look at his report for the last two years. Not a single report has emanated from him in which he has not called the notice of Congress to the extraordinary sufferings, toils, services, and fatigues, of that small Army. Let me call the attention of this House to one paragraph in his last annual report. He tells you:

"For years they have been almost constantly in pursuit of hostile Indians, through swamps and mountains, in heats and snows, and with no inconsiderable loss of life from frequent combats, and a still greater mortality from excessive labor, deprivation, and disease. In other wars those hardships are occasionally broken by rest and comfort, now long unknown to nine tenths of our troops; and hence another great evil—the numerous desertions which daily thin their ranks."

In other services, it seems, there is a respite from toil; there is some occasional moment of repose; but in our Army, he tells you that they are under a continuing, wearing operation of fatigue and exposure, that destroys, and must break down, the small body of men who are thus compelled to endure these fatigues.

What says General Jesup, one of the best informed military men in this country? In his last report he tells you that this little Army performs more duty, and carries on more extensive operations, than any one hundred thousand men in any other service in the world.

Well, sir, look at the general orders which are issued every year, as a record of the acts of this army. You will there see that during the last year there were twenty-eight conflicts with our Indian foes, in which were exhibited an amount of suffering and exposure which troops have been very rarely called upon to endure. Talk to me about any want of capacity in the regular Army of this country to meet the requirements of the public service, when I see in these Army orders that they have traveled more than one thousand miles in pursuit of Indians, marching in seven days three hundred and fifty miles, and in a single day eighty miles! Tell me of the want of capacity to endure the hardships of a military life, when you see them stretched, night after night, upon the frozen snows of the mountains, and feeding upon the horses they have been compelled to abandon, and suffering for days without water! Talk to me of the want of vigilance, when you find, by referring to these Army orders, that in one day a single party surprised and captured three Indian encampments!

Well, sir, do all these services of this band of men enable you to discharge that highest and holiest duty which a Government owes to its people—the protection of their lives and property? Sir, I beg to call the attention of this House to what I regard, under the circumstances, as a solemn declaration and a solemn admonition from the executive department of the Government to this body. I read from the last report of the Secretary of War:

"If there is a higher duty than another devolved upon a well-regulated Government, it is to afford perfect protection to its citizens against outrage and personal violence; yet this great obligation is not performed by the Government of the United States. For a large portion of the year, scarcely a week elapses without bringing to us intelligence of some Indian massacre, or outrage more shocking than death itself; and it most frequently happens that these acts go unpunished altogether, either from the want of troops for pursuit, or from their remoteness from the scenes of slaughter, which renders pursuit useless."

Here you have, from that branch of the Government upon which, emphatically, the Constitution has devolved the duty of protecting the lives and property of the people of the country, the startling fact announced that this Government does not perform the high duty which it owes to its citizens; and you are earnestly importuned, by every obligation which you owe to your people, to provide the means of that protection which is their right, and which you have so far failed to furnish.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that, without the slightest reference to our relations with Utah, it is the duty of Congress to increase the military force of this country. Gentlemen suppose that these recommendations which have come from the President, from the Secretary of War, and from the Commander-in-Chief, calling upon Congress to increase the military force, have reference alone to our relations with Utah. It is not so, sir. They have reference to the defenseless condition of the Indian frontier; and they have further alluded to our relations with Utah as another matter worthy of the consideration of Congress. You are, therefore, to regard the Mormon rebellion as another element to be considered in addition to the existing military necessities of this country.

Sir, I am not disposed to spend much of the time of the House in adverting to this Utah question. It has been sufficiently discussed already in the newspapers and in this House. As to the cases of individual wrong and injustice that are supposed to have occurred in that Territory, I have nothing to say. They are asserted upon the one side and denied upon the other. They are not elements in the decision of this question.

With their social and religious institutions—as abhorrent as they are to the dignity of human nature, to sound morality, and to the principles of the Christian faith—this Government has nothing to do. But there is an aspect of their relations to us, upon which we not only have a right to act, but on which it is our solemn duty to act, and to act promptly. That Territory, sir, was purchased by the blood and treasure of the people of these States. It was freely held out as a home and an inheritance to every man who chose to go there, and acknowledge the supremacy of our laws and the binding character of our institutions. It has now been settled by a population who deny their obligations to this federative system, who repudiate the authority of our laws, and trample under foot the supremacy of our Constitution. They have, by proclamation and by their acts, placed themselves in an attitude of armed rebellion against your authority. Professing some wild and treasonable ideas of the doctrine of "popular sovereignty," they assert their right to elect all their own officers, and to manage their own affairs, in utter contempt and defiance of the authority of this Government. They are carrying out these ideas practically. It is not simply the edict of Governor Young; he is sustained by the Legislative Council recently assembled in that Territory. They have denied admission to our civil officers and employes; they deny admission into that Territory to your troops; they have waylaid your trains, and plundered and robbed them; and they stand before you now in the attitude of hostile defiance to this Government. Is there a man upon this floor who will, for a moment, tolerate such an invasion of the rights of this nation? I am sure, sir, there is not one; there is not a heart in this Hall that will not respond to the demand of the Executive to maintain the supremacy of the law and enforce the rights of our Government in that Territory.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the real question, as I apprehend it—a question upon which every gentleman here ought to desire information—is what amount of force do the necessities of the country now require, and what should be the character of that force? Should it be, as recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, volunteer; or should it be an increase of our regular force? In the determination of this question, there are economical and political considerations as well as military considerations, to be weighed by this body. Sir, this is the 9th of March. More than three months have passed since the Executive of the United States has called the attention of Congress to this pressing exigency in our public affairs. You have known from the reports of the agents, on your table, the unsettled, unquiet, precarious condition of the Indian population. You have known for three months that Utah has been in armed rebellion against your Government. You have known that the small advance corps that was sent there last summer is now within one hundred and thirteen miles of Salt Lake City—a force so small as to invite, by your apathy, in addition to the paucity of its numbers, aggression from the overwhelming forces of the Mormons and their Indian allies. Well, sir, to give to that advance corps the assistance that the Executive felt it was his duty to give them, to deter these Mormons from the rash attempt of attacking this force because of the paucity of its numbers, he has felt compelled, under his high constitutional obligations, to converge from Texas and the northwest an army which he intends shall move from Fort Leavenworth in the month of May next for Utah. These scattered forces are concentrating at that point with a view to take up their march against the Utah Territory. That was a proper and necessary decision of the President. Hostilities from the Indian tribes were possible, nay, probable; but there was a certain, definite contingency which left the Executive no discretion. He has therefore ordered the frontier troops from along the line of the eastern Indian frontier to place themselves in a condition to march to Utah without delay. And now the question for this body is—a question which presents itself in a form that cannot be disregarded—what will you do with the Indian frontier?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. What was the date of the President's determination to concentrate the United States troops at Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not in my power to state the date of the Executive action on the subject. I only state a fact which is known to me, and is sufficiently authenticated by the newspapers, speaking of the march of the Army from Texas, Arkansas, and other points, where they have been recently stationed.

Now, the question, I repeat, which forces itself on the consideration of every gentleman in this Hall is: what is to be done with the Indian frontier, thus necessarily stripped of the force essential for its protection? How is this vacuum to be supplied? Is it to be supplied by regulars or volunteers? Would volunteers engage in that service? Would volunteers be indebted to any gentleman who would place them on any such service as that? Will you refuse an addition to the regular force? Will you refuse both, and throw upon the Executive that responsibility which will devolve upon him under the law of 1795, to call out the militia for the protection of the frontiers—the most expensive and least efficient force that can be applied, necessarily so on account of its short term of service?

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that volunteers would not be of any material service for the exigency to which I allude, to fill the vacuum created by the withdrawal of our troops to Utah. But, suppose it was necessary to organize an increase of your force, in addition to that army which will leave your western frontier in the month of May, to go and vindicate the laws of the land in Utah. What should it be, a regular force or a volunteer force? Sir, it is made an objection to the regular force, that it becomes a permanent addition to your Army, and a permanent source of expenditure; whereas it is said that volunteers may be disbanded at any moment when their term of service expires. I deny the force of any such argument. I say it is in your power, and it is so provided in the bill now before you, to discharge this regular force, now to be organized, at the end of two years.

But, sir, there is a military aspect of the question of more importance than that. If you bring out volunteers for the Utah service you must send them there. They volunteer for that service. It is for that that they come under contract with the Government, and untrained and undisciplined as they may be, there they must go. Whereas, if you make an addition to your regular Army, the practical operation will be, that you take these raw recruits and send them to your Indian frontier, while you can subtract just so many veteran, experienced troops, for the service in Utah. I repeat it, if you take volunteers, raw and undisciplined as they may be, you must march them on to Utah. That is where they have contracted to go; and nowhere else would you think of sending them. Well, sir, that is a march of one thousand two hundred miles at the very start. Is that a march for raw and inexperienced troops? And again, sir, for what service is it that you want them? Why, sir, for the most delicate service that has ever arisen under this Federal Government. It is to subdue a refractory Territory to obedience to your laws. So far, with all their rebellion, not one drop of human blood has yet been shed in that Territory. So far, from the foundation of this Government, not one drop of human blood has been shed in maintaining the supremacy of the Constitution and laws. And I say, God forbid the day should ever arrive when this Government is to be sustained by shedding the blood of its citizens. You want for this service a force free from passion, free from excitement—such a force as a wise Government will always resort to for the maintenance of its power. A regular soldier is an unimpassioned instrument of war. He is a machine in the hands of higher intelligence. He is the child of obedience. Obedience is the law of his existence. He is ready to march or counter-march; to go into cantonments or go into the cannon's mouth, as his superior officer may order him to do. You want a soldiery which will be under the perfect control of its officers. You want no soldiery that can or may control its own officers. You want such a force—if the prejudices of some gentlemen will excuse me for making the comparison—as this Government has had in the Territory of Kansas for the last two years; where, amidst the wildest ravings of the social and political tempest, it has succeeded in preserving law and order without shedding one drop of human blood. That is the sort of force you want in Utah. You do not want that force which a leading Virginia editor, in a paper that I received yesterday morning, says you do want. He says, recommending volunteers, that it would be best to send a body of men to that Territory who would go inspired by religious repugnances of the abominations of Mormonism. This has been too much the language of the public press. I do not condemn the sentiment of opposition to the abominations of Mormonism. I only condemn it in connection with an appeal to the military power of this country to put them down. I fear that much of the impulse given to volunteers has sprung from this sentiment of hostility to the religion of the Mormons.

Sir, too much has been urged in this country in favor of this expedition as a movement against the religion of the people of Utah. I trust there is to be no religious war stimulated from these halls of legislation. We have nothing to do with the religion of that people, repugnant and degrading as it may be. We have no license in the Constitution to "let loose the dogs of war" to hunt down any set of people for their religion, no matter how abhorrent it may be. He who goes to Utah, whether as volunteer or regular, with the intent and purpose of making war upon that people because of their religion, will, if he sheds blood on such a mission, have committed murder in the eye of the Constitution. There is but one duty which devolves upon this Government. It is to maintain the supremacy of our authority in that Territory. For all the rest we must trust to the mild influences of Christianity; we must trust to the benignant influences of our glorious form of free government, under which, as Jefferson has said, error may be tolerated with reason left free to combat it.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 64.

Sir, no man in the House will go further than I will in the performance of the proper duty which devolves upon us. I assert our full dominion over the Territories. I will go all proper lengths to put down the Mormon rebellion. I will crush it in every form so far as it has arrayed itself in opposition to the authority of this Government; but I would do it by the regular, established, cool and unimpassioned judicial, and, if need be, military energies of the country.

Sir, the gentleman from Mississippi tells us that the volunteer force is the peculiar growth of this country. If it be true that it is an American institution, and that, as such, it is to us a source of national pride, it is because of its past recollections and history. Heretofore, this appeal has never been made to the country by Congress for volunteers, except when done to defend the sanctity of our homes and of our firesides; to expel the invader of our soil, and to plant the victorious eagles of our country upon the Capitol of a foreign foe. But now, for the first time in our history, is Congress appealed to, to invoke the passions of this nation, to organize a volunteer force which is expected to mark with blood the triumph of federal power over a Territory of this Union. I look with alarm upon such a precedent. I know the intensity of sectional hate and the rancor of political feeling which too often sway the passions of this people. Establish the precedent once that Federal power may make this appeal to the passions of the country to maintain its authority, and you inaugurate a practice and a power fruitful of the most dangerous consequences in our system. From its successful application to a Territory, it will be an easy step, under the control of a reckless and dominant majority, to extend it to a State. Such precedents, once established, are not forgotten. They are seized by the hands of power, and perverted beyond the original intention. I am not willing to take any step in that direction. It is not asked by the President, nor demanded by the necessities of the country.

But I must for the present pass over this view of the subject, and proceed with the military view of this question. The gentleman from Mississippi has said that it is a duty of this House to respond to the executive recommendations which have been made to us. I agree with him, and I go one step further than he has done. I say that, while it is the unquestionable right of Congress to determine the propriety of the increase of our military force, yet, sir, inasmuch as the Constitution creates the President of the United States the Commander-in-Chief of your Army, and devolves upon him the responsibility of this arm of the public service, it is no more than a proper deference and courtesy to that branch of the Government to place at its disposal the particular character of force which it thinks most efficient for the purpose contemplated. Now, sir, there can be no mistake about the opinions of the Secretary of War upon this point. He has told us, in language too strong to be misconceived, that he does not want volunteers.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman tell me where he finds the opinions of the President or Secretary of War upon this point?

Mr. FAULKNER. The gentleman will find that I am right. The gentleman will find appended to the report of the Secretary of War and President's message, a statement of the comparative expenses of the volunteer and regular forces of the country for the last twenty-two years. Why did he append these statistics, if it was not to admonish, and if need be to implore, Congress not to place in his hands a description of force which he does not want? I well remember in 1854, when there was a threatened outbreak of the whole Indian population in the Northwest, and when a call was made upon Congress for an increase of the regular Army, the attempt was made, as it is now, to substitute three thousand volunteers for the proposed increase of the regular Army. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] and myself had very much the same discussion then which has taken place now. He then called upon the War Department for an estimate of what would be the expense of three thousand volunteers; and the Secretary, after replying to the call, and showing that the expense of the three thousand mounted volunteers would be $3,920,485—about one million and a half more than the four regiments called for—proceeds, in the close of that report, to say that he had called upon Congress for a regular force; and if you substituted the militia for the regular force asked for, the responsibility of the consequences would not be upon him.

Well, sir, never was there a more threatening general outbreak amongst the Indian tribes; and yet the policy of an increase of the regular Army triumphed in that contest before the Thirty-Third Congress. It was accordingly sent to that frontier; a single skirmish took place, and peace was restored. Now, sir, it was the deliberate opinion of that distinguished statesman and officer, familiar as he is with all branches of the public service, regular and volunteer, in Mexican and in the Indian wars, that if those three thousand volunteers had been sent to that country at that time, there would have been a general outbreak of Indian hostilities such as it would have, perhaps, taken years to quell, and at the cost of millions of dollars.

Now, sir, it would seem that the present Secretary of War was apprehensive that Congress, from some outside pressure of popular feeling, might substitute a volunteer corps instead of the regular force asked for; and he has therefore presented to Congress, accompanying his report, documents and statistics bearing upon that subject which it ought to be the duty of every member upon this floor to read before he acts upon this bill.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] as an argument against the regular Army, brought forward the number of desertions from the regular Army. Now, sir, that there should be desertions in such an army as General Scott has described as having no repose from the toils and fatigues of the camp, is not surprising. Especially it is not surprising that desertions should occur in an army in a new country, in the new States, where labor is high; where there are no land bounties promised them to induce them to hold out until the end of their service; where they have, probably, no friends at home to cheer them on their return for their courage, or to frown upon them for their want of fidelity. The gentleman has asked, when, in the history of this country, did a volunteer ever desert? I refer the gentleman to the records of the Mexican war, and there I show him that there were three thousand eight hundred and seventy desertions from the ranks of the volunteers in that Mexican war; whereas, there were but two thousand eight hundred and forty-nine from the ranks of the regular Army. And while upon this subject of the Mexican war, I beg leave to call attention to a table now before me, presenting some interesting facts.

It appears there were in that war some twenty-six thousand regulars and seventy-three thousand volunteer troops. Of those who were killed and died of wounds in battle, there were eight hundred and sixty-two regulars, five hundred and sixty-seven volunteers. Of those wounded in battle, two thousand and seventy-five were regulars, one thousand three hundred and eighteen volunteers. In the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, fought 19th and 20th of August, 1847, there were, volunteers killed and wounded, two hundred and thirty-nine; regulars, seven hundred and fifty-nine. In the battle of El Molino del Rey, fought 8th September, 1847, there were, of regulars killed and wounded, seven hundred and six; volunteers, none. There were, I presume, no volunteers engaged in that fight. In the battles of Chapultepec and city of Mexico, fought 12th, 13th, and 14th of September, were, volunteers killed and wounded, two hundred and seventy-three; regulars, five hundred and thirty-eight.

I do not present these facts with any view to disparage the volunteer force. They acted nobly. They did their whole duty to their country. But I present them because I believe that the regular Army has not had that justice done to it by Congress, and by the country, which its gallantry, its sacrifices, its sufferings, its perils, and its toils, so greatly entitle it to receive from them.

The paymaster's report exhibits a fact which does not seem questioned by the gentleman from Mississippi, that the mounted volunteer costs, in proportion to the infantry, six to one. But, says the gentleman, it is not a fair point of comparison to place the mounted volunteers against regular infantry. I say it is in one aspect a fair point of comparison. And why? The day has gone by, if I can read the records of this country, when you can rely upon volunteers except as a mounted force. Every man who now volunteers expects to do so as a mounted volunteer. Look at what occurred in Florida even. Of the fifteen thousand volunteers, twelve thousand were mounted men. Look at the whole volunteer force of this country since the termination of the Mexican war, and out of a force of near eight thousand only four hundred and seventy-two were not mounted. Of the volunteer force in Florida at the present moment there is not one but is mounted.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would inquire if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. QUITMAN. I rise to a question of order. It seems to me that there is a mistake in considering debate upon this bill as being limited to the morning hour. The report of this bill from the Committee on Military Affairs was originally made by the unanimous consent of the House, and it occurs to me, though not very familiar with the rules, that the bill is the order of the day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The only advantage which the gentleman from Mississippi derived from reporting the bill by unanimous consent, was that it entitled the bill to be considered during the morning hour. Unanimous consent was given, and the committee reported the bill at a time different from what it would have been reported except by unanimous consent. It is, therefore, subject to the rules which control the reports of committees.

The motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was then agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Houshron in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the upon which Mr. KEITT was entitled to the floor.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, in considering the application of Kansas for admission into the Union, two questions legitimately present themselves: 1st, the constitutionality of her application; and 2d, the expediency of her admission. The first division of the subject distributes itself under two heads: 1. The power of Congress in the premises; and 2. The character of the procedures in Kansas.

1. The power of Congress in the premises. Whatever power Congress possesses must be derived from the Constitution. Through it the original thirteen independent and sovereign States formed a federative league or Union. All the privileges and prohibitions contained in it were imparted to, and equally obligatory upon, the States which might be admitted into the Union. The Federal Constitution is a compact between sovereignities; and Congress, being the creature of the Constitution, is endowed only with such powers as the Constitution has conferred upon it. Gouverneur Morris, in a letter to Lewis R. Morris, dated December 10, 1803, uses this language:

"The Constitution (Federal) was a compact, not between solitary individuals, but between political societies; the people, not of America, but of the United States; each enjoying sovereign power, and, of course, equal rights."

The exercise of power by Congress is limited to enumerated cases; and to exclude the general discretion which might follow grants of political power, it is also hemmed in by prohibitions. Where a general power is given, because of the inability to specify the particular and shifting exigencies to which it is intended to be applied, it is walled in, as much as practicable, by prohibitions. Whatever power, then, Congress has to initiate a new State into the Union, or inspect its application, is derived from the Constitution. What power has Congress? Only the power granted in the third and fourth sections of the fourth article of the Constitution: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union;" and, "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." When the requirements of these clauses are fulfilled, the power of Congress is exhausted.

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." What is a State? A political community, organized with all the privileges, rights, and immunities of sovereignty. The admission of a State is her admission into a Union, founded, in the language of Gouverneur Morris, upon a "compact between political societies, each enjoying sovereign power, and, of course, equal rights." The right to admit new States is a right to treat with an equal for a specific purpose, viz: her admission into the Union. It excludes the very idea of inferiority or subordination. It gives no power, as has been contended, to rear, train up, and prepare infant societies for political maturity. It gives no power to breed States out of nascent communities or territorial pupillage. This clause of the Constitution does not endow Congress with the duties and attributes of the proprietaries of antiquity, whose vocation was to breed children for the service of the State. No, sir, the genesis of States is not found in this article of the Constitution.

The distinctive feature of a Federal Union is the equality of the parties to it. The amount of power granted in our Constitution being specific, and being made up of equal contributions by all the parties to it, an exact equality must exist among them. In a constitution containing general grants of power, subject to particular limitations, the limitation on the power must be shown by those who contest its exercise. But in our Constitution, there is a delegation of powers, limited by enumeration; and the positive grant must be shown by those who exercise a disputed or doubtful power. The power, then, to admit new States, being only a power to treat with equals, is exhausted when the treaty is made.

What power, now, does the fourth section, obliging Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, confer? This must be answered by solving the question, what constitutes a republican form of government? A republican form of government consists in the distribution of its powers. The central forces of a political community can only be appropriately divided between the legislative, judicial, and executive branches. This distinct division of power brings the government within the generic term republican. Impress it with this form, and Congress cannot look into the minor details of the constitution, or the character of the constituency. If the constitution impugns individual rights, the judiciary affords the redress; if it affects the political principles which have been committed to the custody of the General Government, then Congress steps in and applies the remedy.

"Congress shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government." It can inspect a constitution no deeper than its form. If the organization of a State be republican; if its machinery be similar to the political machinery of any one of the original thirteen States, the duty and the power of Congress, under this clause of the Constitution, are discharged. Is not the form of government in Kansas republican? Is not all power divided between the legislative, judicial, and executive departments? Are any of the prohibitions of the Federal Constitution violated? Defects in a State constitution, which attach to the form of the government, are within the inspection and control of Congress; defects not of this particular character are beyond its reach. Congress can look only to the political character of the constitution; beyond this it cannot look.

The form of government in Kansas being republican, the requirements of the fourth section of the fourth article of the Federal Constitution are fulfilled. The constitution of Kansas, then, amply meets and discharges the powers of Congress in the premises.

The second branch of the proposition is, the character of the procedures in Kansas. The distinctive feature of the Federal Government is, that it is a union between political societies. Its powers touch, and its functions apply to external objects. Municipal or interior affairs are within the jurisdiction of State authority. To the guardianship of the Federal Government are committed our general relations with foreign nations, and certain interests common to the several sovereign States, in virtue of their sovereignty, or in consequence of stipulations in the Federal Constitution or treaty. The interior relations—the relations between man and man, in the same political community—are within the absolute and exclusive control of the States.

The Federal Government acts simply upon political societies. It does not know the political rights of the mere individual; it does not know the existence of unorganized masses. The Federal Government did not create political societies; it is itself the creature of them. A treaty, or league, must be between organized communities. A State constitution may be the product of agreement between individuals. A Federal constitution is the product of agreement between preëxisting organized communities. In other words, individuals make a State; States make a confederation. Individuals are the constituents of the one, States of the other. The Federal Government, then, knows only political entities—the concrete forms through which the aggregated community acts upon other concrete forms in which other political communities are tangibly embodied. To bring a Federal Government to act upon the political rights of mere individuals; to take political cognizance of masses of men unorganized, and in their primary condition, would be to subvert its foundations and erase its federal features. It is a confusion of words. The Federal Government, then, being founded upon a compact between political societies, being limited in its jurisdiction to organized systems, we are confined in our examination of the application of Kansas for admission into the Union, to the proceedings of the legal bodies in Kansas.

What are the legal bodies there? The constituted territorial authorities? I premit any discussion of the proposition, whether Congress has power, from the Constitution, to exercise acts of legislative authority over a Territory, and say that whatever power Congress has is restrained by the distinctive and elementary character of the Confederacy, namely, the equality of the States. The fact is true, however, that Congress has initiated political society in Kansas; and our examinations now must begin from that starting point. Congress, then, organized a legal body in Kansas, and invested it with competent authority over the Territory. No act which has not the sanction of the territorial authorities is legal. The first question then is: is the constitution of Kansas the product of a legal body? That depends upon whether the convention which framed the constitution had the sanction of the regular territorial authorities. Did it not have that sanction? The Territorial Legislature, by law, submitted to the electors, at the ballot-box, whether or not they would have a convention to organize a State government. They decided that they would. A convention was then called, with the usual legal forms and ceremonies. I have omitted to discuss the necessity of an enabling act by Congress, because it is contended that an enabling act is contained in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and especially because no objection is founded by the leaders of the Opposition, upon the absence of an enabling act.

The convention, then, was the legitimate product of the legal territorial authorities. What is a convention called to frame a State constitution? It is the incarnation, the embodiment of the people. The essence of sovereignty—the metaphysical idea of sovereignty—is a unit; but sovereignty is practically exercised through its attributes, and these attributes are susceptible of delegation. In a frame-work of government, radically and essentially founded upon a representative system, the whole people are resolved into a convention called to frame and settle their organic system. It is not a committee, a subordinate instrument; but it is, in theory, the people, clothed with their power, their majesty, and their political omnipotence. Political society must have a starting point; it must have an initial existence. In a mere democracy it takes it from the mass; in a representative system it takes it from the representative body. A mere democracy never has existed; but if it could exist, it would be only within a city. All society is founded upon subordination; and subordination, in a political system, involves, necessarily, more or less of representation. Representation is an element in all political systems which have ever been devised and enforced; but the discriminative feature in our republican system is, that the people is a constituent element of representation. In a popular representative system, then, the whole organism rests upon the supreme representative body; namely, the convention. If this were not so, government might not begin; it might continue anarchy and confusion. It is indispensable that government be started; afterward, its amendment, modification, or abolition, is practicable. There is a fundamental difference between a mere democracy and a representative system. The first begins with the mass, and operates through the mass; the latter begins with representation, and operates through representation. The one is a coarse, the other a refined system—the one engenders society, the other frames government.

Society is the normal condition of mankind, therefore men float into it naturally; and masses of men, rough, rude, unchastened, even belligerent, engender society. Government is the concretization and culmination of society, and must pass through a refining and secreting process. Government is an instrument to preserve and perfect society; and to do this, it must collect and use in its ministrations, elements of virtue, intelligence, and wisdom, above the mass which makes up society. In a republican government, the theory of representation is the secreting and refining those elements of society, which steady, preserve, and dignify it. The very conception, then, of a representative system, the higher reaches of its ministries and munificence, rest upon the sovereignty of the convention, embodying the majesty and grandeur and power of the people. Society, in its very existence, negatives the idea of individual sovereignty. It is itself founded upon the sacrifice of the independence of the individual, and draws to itself the rights thus lost or abdicated by these various molecules. In the social system there is no organ through which this sovereignty can be expressed; and, therefore, society, culminating in government, fixes its residence somewhere in the political organization. In a representative political system, it is fixed and embodied in the highest representative body—the convention to frame a constitution.

Every political system is founded upon forms; lives, and is expressed, through forms. You might as well attempt to express an idea without a medium, as to possess the spirit of a system except through forms. We cannot clutch spiritual essences; nor can we grasp a truth utterly disembodied. Media are necessary in all the pursuits of life; and we can only know the spirit of government through its forms. Society itself is but an immense form, in which a community of individuals live together, and through which their wills are expressed. Government itself is another but higher form, in which society itself lives, and through which it is expressed. The independence of individuals is expressed through society into the forms of government, and collected into sovereignty in its supreme form.

The mischievous doctrine of referring constitutions back from the sovereign convention to popular suffrage for ratification, before they become obligatory, is the resolution of government into society, and society into the individuals that compose it. It is reversing the march of mankind, and blotting out the experience of ages. It is reëndowing the individual with the independence which he has abdicated; dissolving the ligaments of society, and trampling down government beneath the barbaric tread of unorganized masses. Could society live a day, with all the individuals that compose it invested, each, with the rights of independence? Could it live a day without law, without order, without peace, and forms? And can it have those with individuals put above society, and society elevated above government? No. Sovereignty holds all things in subjection; and the crown of sovereignty is placed in the higher reaches of virtue, intelligence, and wisdom, and embodied in the highest form of government.

But the mischievous heresy of submitting constitutions to popular ratification, not only emasculates conventions, but it abnegates forms in government. It not only puts the will of the individual above the will of the community in theory, but it seeks to attain it without the intervention of forms. It is striving for perfection through the rude agencies of barbarism. It is a humanitarian attempt to crown individuals with transcendental excellence through the prostitution of society, and the demoralization of government. It is the offspring of that spirit of insubordination which shakes down governments, dissolves society, and lives only in the congenial atmosphere of revolution. It is, in short, the development of individuality at the expense of society. It is even more demoralizing than this: it is the aggravation of individuality into extravagance, through licentiousness and the stimulation of emulous rivals.

But it is not only in its subversion of representative government, and its warfare against society, that this heresy is dangerous. It touches, with rude hands, the very foundations of property itself. It erects individuality into omnipotence over proprietary rights. It ignores the great truth that government is instituted primarily to protect property as well as person. In fact, it stabs government in its most vulnerable point. It subsidizes, through avarice, the many against the few. Property perishes in revolutions; because it is congenial only with law and order and peace. The apotheosis of individual rights, the independence of individuals in a political society, is the utter overthrow of property. Property grows up in society, and is sheltered by government. Whatever, then, impairs society, or saps the foundations of government, shakes the whole system of property.

It is affected in another way by this ominous heresy. It, in theory, gives to each individual the right to appropriate to himself what may be necessary to his support. When the individual is put above society, social stability and peace must yield to his wants. Among sovereigns, might is right; and when want steps in, property is theft. In a political society made up of sovereigns there is no law, no subordination; all is equality, and everything is common. Thus, this theory not only wars against society and government, but it reaches the very origins and mysteries of property.

Government is instituted to protect rights both of person and property. In proportion to the wealth of a community, and its civilization, must the checks and balances in its political system be delicate, numerous, and well-adjusted. In a republican government all are equally interested in the preservation of personal rights; the minority are especially interested in the protection of property. The constitutional guarantees, therefore, should be carefully and skillfully adapted to its maintenance. In a convention all interests and all feelings are judiciously refined, secreted, and weighed; and, therefore, all interests are likely to be properly estimated and decided; in a popular election, ramified through a wide community, popular caprice and popular passion are likely to prevail over cautious deliberation. All the interests of society can be best expressed through a convention; and this is lost in the reference back of its work to popular ratification. Besides, when this element is introduced, the statesman becomes the politician; each representative becomes, not the representative of the community, but of his particular constituency—he represents, not a whole, but a fraction. The very doctrine of the numerical majority in this Confederacy sectionalizes. To this conclusion, the doctrine I am animadverting upon inevitably leads.

In examining the problems which have presented themselves in this discussion, I am not altogether removed from the aids of ancient inquiry. Aristotle has more specially examined the higher questions of speculative politics in the first three books of his great work. What are the origins of political society? Have all men an identical claim to act in political society, and are they entitled to equal rights? What is the end of power? Where does sovereign authority reside? Such are the problems which the philosopher of Stagira examines, as introductory to his exposition of a perfect government. In his view, society is not an accidental and arbitrary fact. It is the result of neither violence nor compact. Like the family, it springs from the depths of nature, which instinctively urges mankind into association to minister to their wants. "Man," he says, "is essentially a sociable being; a political animal; the sense of right and wrong engraved upon his heart marks him for a social destiny."

The end of political society, according to Aristotle, indeed its highest aim, is not merely utility and the pursuit of material advantages; but it is the consecration of justice and right which pre-exist the decisions of the judge. It is something more than these: it implies the moral improvement of its members and the guarantees of happiness, secured by the cultivation of virtue. "Virtue," he says, "commends itself to the first care of a State truly worthy of the name. Otherwise, political society is nothing more than a military alliance with remote nations; and the law brought down to the character of a simple convention, is no longer but a guarantee of individual rights, without any power or influence over the personal morality and justice of the citizen." In this connection, he treats of the distinction between the constitution and the mere laws of the State. "The constitution," he says, "is that which determines in the State the regular organism of all magistracies, and especially of the supreme magistracy. It is the distribution of powers, the attribution of sovereignty; in one word, the defining of the special end of society. The laws, on the contrary, distinct from the essential and characteristic principles of the constitution, are the rule of the magistrate in the exercise of power and the repression of wrong."

The speculations of this great philosopher of antiquity upon the foundations of society and government, are thus in unison with the views I have expressed. They discountenance the doctrine of mobocracy recently so popular under the insurgent title of "popular sovereignty," and exemplified in the Red Republican heresy of referring constitutions to popular ratification.

In this discussion allusions have been made to, and analogies drawn from, the history of Athens and Rome. These have been marked either by the perversions of ingenuity, or the misapplications of ignorance. In paying to the Athenian democracy, as it is called, the tribute which both history and justice would seem to demand, no sanction can be drawn in favor of "popular sovereignty," as it has been recently understood. There is, in truth, no assimilation between modern politics, and the politics of antiquity. Among the ancients, political unity resided in the city. With us, it resides in the people of each State, expressed through, and embodied in, their supreme organism. All the free Governments of antiquity, like those of the Italian Republics of the medieval period, were especially municipal; and they might, therefore, comport with the direct intervention of the citizens, meeting in a general assembly. Our Republic, on the contrary, is necessarily representative in its character; and, save in primary meetings, only admits the indirect action of the people, delegating their powers to their representatives. The democracy in Athens was founded upon a broad basis of slavery. Although Athens was, in antiquity, the eminently democratic city, she could not escape the normal law of class subordination—in fact, of slavery. True, that Clis-thenes, to strengthen his power, admitted within the ranks of the citizens the free foreign residents and the choice of the city slaves; but this example was not followed, and Pericles himself enacted severe laws to check the impartment of the rights of citizenship. Before his rule, it was enough to have been born of an Athenian father to exercise the rights of a citizen. But his legislation required the origin to come from an Athenian father and mother both; or from an Athenian father, and a mother born in one of the cities to which the stipulations of treaties allowed the marriage right. After the restoration of the democracy by Theseus, the Athenians passed more stringent laws. They confined the civic rights to the sons of Athenian fathers and mothers, and repealed the marriage right previously granted to the various cities by their treaties of alliance. Hence, the political rights continued to be the appanage of an exclusive class—a real nobility de facto. In the most prosperous days of the Republic of Athens, the census never gave more than twenty-four thousand citizens over twenty years of age; a number which answers a total civic population of some hundred thousand souls. There were, besides, some ten thousand μετοικοι, or free residents, not citizens, representing a population of some forty thousand denizens. Although held to military service, they possessed no political rights. They were subject to a poll-tax from which the citizens were free, and no opportunity was allowed to pass to impress them with a sense of their inferiority. Below these was the immense mass of servile population, which the best calculations put at no less than three hundred and sixty thousand. The civic population, therefore, barely constituted one fifth, and the body of citizens entitled to sit in the assemblies of the people, one twentieth, of the total population of Attica. Lastly, if we consider that the highest legislative and judiciary trusts were the exclusive province of the Heliasts more than thirty years of age, and these to the number of six thousand only, we readily perceive that, in Attica, about one out of every eighty persons was admitted to the full enjoyment of political rights.

Thus much for the Athenian democracy. I could easily show that the democracy of Rome, resting upon tribes and centuries, with its whole hierarchy of government founded upon wealth and patrician descent, with its ninety-eight centuries out of one hundred and ninety-three, even in the later days of the Republic, embracing but a small minimum of the people, yet absolute in their political ascendancy, was no more a democracy than that of Athens. But I will not consume time in the adduction of this further proof. I have appealed to these examples only to show that government comports neither with the independence of individuals, nor is founded upon the basis of a numerical majority.

I have thus shown, Mr. Chairman, that the power of Congress in the "admission of new States" is confined to the inspection of its "form of government," and that it is discharged when it is republican in form. I have argued that sovereignty is embodied in and expressed through some political organism; and that, in our system, that organism is the convention called to create and form a constitution. I have argued, further, that the submission of constitutions to popular ratification is violative of the theory of representative government, and that it is agrarian in its tendencies.

Before I pass from this branch of the subject, I may make a remark or two upon a topic kindred to those I have already discussed. Can the constitution of Kansas be legally changed prior to 1864? In my judgment, it cannot. There is a clause in the constitution of Kansas prohibiting the assembling of a convention prior to that time, and this inhibition precludes it. This clause is regarded by some as a nullity. I do not so regard it. Every government that is created by a written charter rests upon it as a foundation. All the agents under it are subordinate, and must act in conformity to its provisions. Whenever an agent, in its exercise of power, exceeds the power granted to it by the author of its being, such exercise of power is illegal and nugatory. A Legislature, then, which is prohibited by the sovereign authority in the organic law from assembling the sovereign authority, acts, in thus assembling it, against, or dehors the constitution, and the act is void from lack of authority. Government presupposes society, and society fixes a residence for sovereignty in some political organism. Sovereignty is the exponent, or rather the multiple, of the united wills, power, and resources of the political community over which it presides; and it is imprisoned in this political organism by the dominant ascendancy or the controlling power of the society. Sovereignty is thus fixed and imprisoned in its political abode; it may be by force, but its first act is to substitute law for violence, and order for disorder. Society ferments, welters, tosses about, until its voice speaks calm, quiet, and consistency. In other words, sovereignty is mere domination and force compressed into a political system, and working peaceably and harmoniously. Its very existence supersedes mere brute violence. When it is organized it assumes a political character, and operates through a congeries of inferior systems and laws. Now, the sovereignty of the people, assembled otherwise than in the manner pointed out by its decrees, is an appeal to force against law, to revolution against order, to anarchy against society. It is, in fact, overthrowing the government, and beginning where the first sovereignty began in its initial attempt to educe order out of confusion. It is true, the sovereignty of to-day cannot tie up the sovereignty of to-morrow; but that of to-day can impose a prohibition upon its agent, invoking it to-morrow; and if it be invoked against the prohibition, it is not the sovereignty known to political philosophy, but a sovereignty only in virtue of brute force. This at once resolves government and society into their constituent elements, and inaugurates anarchy or despotism. The difference between a revolutionary right and a legal right, or a right under the constitution to change the constitution, is clear, distinct, and vital. The one is a political right; the other, the right of the sword. The sword may not be drawn from the scabbard; the olive may be twined around it; but it is still the sword. In government men act through and under its forms; in revolution, they act above and against these forms. These reflections I have thought it proper to make upon a point somewhat agitated in the discussions upon the admission of Kansas, both in this House and in the Senate. It is a point, however, to be settled by others, and cannot legitimately do more than exercise the ingenuity and acumen of Congress. I have touched upon it only with the view of saving myself from being classed with those who confound revolutionary with constitutional rights in a people.

I approach now, Mr. Chairman, the second proposition which I laid down in the beginning of my remarks—the expediency of the admission of Kansas into the Union. I have no threats to make, because I do not allow them to be made against me. But the sky is full of omens, and we may partially read the future through their instructive teachings. In our history, crowded with great events, no spectacle presents itself more imposing in form and outline than that which is now unmasking itself. Three States, with constitutions in their hands, are asking for entrance into the American sisterhood. One comes from the land of prairies; and though her admission swells the free-State power, her outstretched hand is readily taken by the South. Another is coming from close by the setting sun; and though she, too, has joined the free-State band, a cordial greeting is given to her by us of the South, as she sweeps on to occupy her starry place. Next Kansas comes, warm with a southern sun, and escorted by the memories of trials and troubles and sufferings passed. Comes she to widen the Federal circle and strengthen still its bands? Will you, men of the North, give to her a cordial greeting? Will you, members of the Republican party, reject her? If so, why and wherefore? Do you want an enabling act? Did you have one for the Topeka convention? And did you not lasciviously embrace the work of that rebellious mob, and offer to open wide the portals of the Union to Kansas, brought to us then under the auspices of violence and blood and insurrection? Do you demand the ratification of the constitution by popular suffrage? Did you have it for the Topeka constitution when, born of rebellion, covered with crime, stained with usurpation, it came to us trampling upon law, confiscating property, and waging war upon the constitution? Will you call the parsimonious and attenuated contrivance for collecting the popular will, and the meager vote, even of the rebels, in favor of that sarcasm upon constitutions, a provision for, and an expression of, the public will? If so, you plant snares against the people, and strangle their will by the very machinery contrived to express it. No; you reject Kansas now, neither because of the lack of an enabling act, nor the failure to submit the constitution to a vote of the people. Why, then, do you reject her? Because she recognizes and protects slavery in her constitution. Sir, in your Philadelphia platform there are canonical words, declaring that "no slave State shall hereafter be admitted into the Union." In pursuance of this fixed and relentless policy, you reject Kansas. The leader of the Free-soil cohorts, the anointed preacher of this new evangel, [Mr. SEWARD,] has recently told us, from the other wing of the Capitol, that the battle was "already fought and won." He said, also, that an organization only a little more perfect was needed for the North to take possession of every department of the Government, and wield its power for the benefit and aggrandizement of herself. Yes, Congress, the Executive, and even the Supreme Court, were to be used by her for plunder and fanaticism. To keep the South in a fixed and hopeless minority, no slave State was hereafter to be admitted; while all the power and machinery of the Government were to be appropriated by the North to plunder and oppress her. Reject a slave State because of slavery in her constitution, and I tell you that you will shake this Federal temple from turret to foundation stone. Tell the South that you reject a slave State to keep her in a minority, that you may plunder her, and I tell you that no Federal tax-gatherer, though backed by all the legions of the North, will ever again tread her soil. The Republican party, through the power of the free States, may take possession of the Government, but I tell them they will clutch only a phantom. Whenever their work of incendiary propaganda shall begin, whenever their work of revolution shall begin, this Union will end. It may end in peace, or it may end in blood; but end it will. Sir, peace may be bought too dearly; it always is, when it is bought at the price of honor, independence, and manhood.

And how fares it with the Democrats of the North, who now oppose the admission of Kansas? Do they want an enabling act? Do they want a submission of the constitution to the vote of the people? Their great leader [Judge DOUGLAS] says that these are not indispensable. What, then, do they require? Some proof, say they, that the constitution embodies the public will. What proof can you have outside of law? How can you reach the public will otherwise than through the forms and agencies of law? Society and government are but organized forms of the public will; and this will, in the existence of society and government, is afterward reached by inferior and subordinate forms. The ballot-box itself is but a form; is but a contrivance of law in ascertaining it. The expression of the public will in any government is a legal act. The right to vote is not a natural right; it is a political right, and its exercise is not compulsory. The will of those who so vote, must stand for the will of those who do not vote. The ballot-box is but a contrivance for collecting and expressing the public will; the public will is collected in and expressed through the constitutional convention in a much higher and grander form. How, then, do you deny that the constitution of Kansas embodies the will of the people of Kansas, unless you mean to seek that will outside of the legal means? You have that will through the convention; you have it, also, through the ballot-box, in the elections on the 21st December, and those are the only legal means known to us. The votes cast on the 4th of January for and against the constitution were cast without sanction of law, and were, therefore, nullities. They cannot be known to us. In a political society no political act can be known otherwise than through law.

The tendency of the opinion I am now reproaching, is to degrade popular sovereignty into the "sovereignty of the populace," as it has been happily termed by my colleague in the Senate, [Mr. HAMMOND,] in his recent able, eloquent, and unanswerable speech upon this subject. The "sovereignty of the populace" is not only above law, but it is against law. The moment you go outside of the forms of law to ascertain the public will, you go to revolution. If you want the public will embodied in and expressed through the forms of law, you have it; if you want more, you must go to revolution and anarchy.

In 1854, the northern advocates of the Nebraska-Kansas bill urged the passage of the bill to invest the people with the right to govern themselves. They appealed to the spirit of the Revolution, and marshaled before us, in shadowy pomp, the memories of the founders of the Republic. Their appeals stirred the blood, urged on the flagging judgment, and the bill passed. The people of Kansas became invested with the right to govern themselves. In pursuance of this right, and of the provisions of this bill, they now come to us for admission into the Union. And now how fares it with these Paladins of popular sovereignty? Their swords flash no longer against the Black Republican Saracens, but are bared in relentless fight against their own chosen doctrine. We are told that Congress must govern the Territory of Kansas; that the inhabitants of Kansas must be kept in a state of pupillage. Is it from love of law? No; for you tread law in the dust in doing this. Is it from love of liberty? No; for liberty lives only in law, and speaks only through its forms.

Sir, I will not say that these gentlemen are incited by solicitude for the torrent of fanaticism now swelling and surging behind them. I will not say that they are stirred to it by the lust of power and domination. But the one or the other may not be entirely absent. The old leaven of domination may be working now, as it worked eighty years ago. Gouverneur Morris, in a letter to Henry W. Livingston, dated December 4, 1803, says:

"I perceive, now, that I mistook the drift of your inquiry, which is, substantially, whether the Congress can admit, as a new State, territory which did not belong to the United States when the Constitution was made? In my opinion, they cannot. I always thought that when we should acquire Canada and Louisiana, it would be proper to govern them as provinces, and allow them no voice in our councils. In wording the third section of the fourth article, I went as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion. Candor obliges me to add my belief that, had it been more pointedly expressed, a strong opposition would have been made."

In his view, the "old thirteen States" were to be constructed into a political hierarchy, resting upon, and governing provinces, with absolute despotism. Our eagles were to be carried as were carried the eagles of Rome, until, with the wafture of their wings, they had fanned away the pride and pomp and power of surrounding nations, and this whole continent was embraced in the meshes of our proconsular despotism. The old thirteen, like a Corinthian shaft, was to spire upward to the heavens; but it was to rest upon a dome covering blood and rapine and tyranny. Has the ghost of this murdered scheme come back unannealed and blood-boltered, to spell your gaze with its basilisk fascination? Do you want to conquer States and provinces, and send forth proconsuls covered with pomp, and backed by legions, to glut your greed upon plundered wealth, and sate your lust of power on ruined victims? Do you want a triumphal march to the Capitol, with the spoils of plundered provinces to deck your pathway, and an enslaved people gathered around your chariot wheels? If you do, the genius of the country, the spirit of the Government, will war against and war you down. If you do not, this sacrilegious end may be accomplished by your policy.

Sir, we are at a critical point in our history. Agrarianism is facing law, and disorder smiting at order. The guarantees of the Constitution are in peril, and the sanctity of that instrument is threatened with invasion. Constitutions are about to be confounded with laws, and the great partitions of power are being broken down. The doctrine of the numerical majority inaugurates the reign of brute force. It brings with it the demon of discord, fire-tongued and red-lipped, to do its work of confusion, confiscation, and blood. Sir, this doctrine can only be enthroned upon the ruins of the Constitution; it can only draw life from the corpse of the Republic; and when it is enthroned, and life imparted to it, the pestilent exhalations will smite down genius and law and order and patriotism, as the fabulous exhalations of the Avernian marsh smote down the perishing bird with its stifling vapors. There is no curse so bitter and blasting to a political society as the rule of a mob; and, under these stimulating heresies, the numerical majority will become but a mob. Sir, against the banns about to solemnize the marriage between fanaticism and brute force, I solemnly protest. I protest in the name of the Republic, its memories and its hopes. The star of our destiny has led us from triumph to triumph, and from conquest to conquest; it still shines upon, and lures us on from summit to summit of power and renown; and from each ascending cliff we behold still broader and richer landscapes unfolding around us. Shall we pause in this more than Olympic career of greatness, hearken to the orgies of fanaticism, and then, with lowered colors and muffled drum, march back along that downward road already trodden hard by the footsteps of generations dead and buried, and still covered with the wrecks of systems barbarous and systems nascent and systems more advanced, but blindly struggling? Against this consummation, may I not appeal to those who have worn the amulets of the Democracy, to array themselves? They have carried its flag in many a fight. Will they now fly from the field, and abandon their old comrades?

Sir, events are drifting to a dissolution of the Confederacy. The slavery question, it would seem, will split it, as it has hitherto preserved it. Feud, rivalry, jealousy, class strife at the North, have been kept down by a foreign war, by that section, against the South. But for this, they would long since have risen up and shaken down the fabric of Government and society. The South, too, has been made firmer, and pressed closer together by her resistance to this war. Through it both sections are being rapidly consolidated. This consolidation has hitherto been prevented by the Democratic party. Its ranks are now being thinned by desertion, and broken through by assaults. When it gives way, the bands of this Union will be burst asunder. The President still stands firm, crowned with civic honors, covered with the love of the people, and guarded by the patriotism of the country; he still holds the citadel of the Constitution, and has planted its flag upon the topmost turret. The South sustains him, and the "old guard of the free States" have locked their shields around him. They have rejected the blandishments of local patronage and the seductions of leaders once trusted, and have stood to their duty and their colors. The "old guard" of Napoleon, which had carried his eagles all over Europe, and shaken them out only in victory, were drawn up to see the Louvre stripped of the glories and trophies they had gathered there, and to give in their adhesion to the new powers. They saw glories and trophies disappear both; and stirred no feature, and moved not a step, while these were borne away. But when their loyalty was asked to the new powers, they indignantly scorned the proposal. Like the "old guard" of Napoleon stands the old guard of Democracy in the free States; it still stands true to the traditions and testimonials and histories of its past; it scorns the advances of fanaticism; nor, without striking a blow, will it allow one of its glories to be sullied, or one of its trophies to be removed. Will you, who have been in this old guard, take your former place in its ranks; or will you go over to another standard, and swell the legions of the enemy? Your answer will be historical. Make it well, and make it wisely.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, I propose submitting some remarks, at this time, upon the present aspect of the Kansas question, and the course I shall probably feel it my duty to pursue in relation to that subject.

I have thus far in the session carefully abstained from taking any part in the discussion of the vexed question, deeming the premature introduction of the subject into the debates of Congress as exceedingly unfortunate, because calculated to lead to bad feeling in the Democratic party and the country. In my judgment, it would have been far better for all concerned if the matter had been left alone until it came up legitimately for the action of Congress.

The time for action, however, has arrived; and I shall not shrink from discharging the duty which devolves upon me as one of the Representatives of the people.

Sir, it is either my good or ill fortune to have been, in some sort, a participator in the legislation pertaining to Kansas since the subject was introduced in the Thirty-Third Congress. At that time I was a member of the Committee on Territories, which was charged with the consideration of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and although not concurring in the propriety of bringing the measure forward at that time, I believed the principle it contained right, and gave it my most zealous and cordial support. I not only gave it the support of my vote and my voice, on the floor of the House of Representatives, but labored for its success many anxious days and nights as a member of an advisory or vigilance committee which was called into being by the friends of the bill, in caucus; and, sir, I may add, that I am not entirely ignorant of the inside history of that great, and for some time, uncertain contest.

The passage of the bill did not, as many fondly hoped, prove a termination to the struggle. It was but adjourned to another arena; and we northern supporters of the measure went home to encounter an opposition, the fierce and vindictive character of which our southern brethren have scarcely a conception; and which, I am sorry to be compelled to add, I fear they did not fully appreciate, or have too soon forgotten. We were denounced as dough-faces and traitors; our names were paraded in the papers of the day, in large type, encircled with black lines, and headed, "The roll of infamy;" we were hung in effigy, and every indignity that the ingenuity and malignity of fanaticism could devise was heaped upon us. And, sir, it should not be forgotten, that when we men of the North went forth to encounter this fearful army of fanatics, this great army of Abolitionists, Know Nothings, and Republicans combined, you, gentlemen of the South, were at home at your ease, because you had not run counter to the sympathies and popular sentiments of your people: you went with the current—we against it. We risked everything—you comparatively nothing; and now I appeal to you whether, for the sake of an empty triumph of no permanent benefit to you or your "peculiar institution," you will turn a deaf ear to our earnest entreaties for such an adjustment of this question as will enable us to respect the wishes of our constituents and maintain the union and integrity of our party at home? Look to it, ye men of the South, that you do not, for a mere shadow, strike down or drive from you your only effective support outside the limits of your own States! When your peculiar institutions are assailed, when Cuba and the countries south of our present limits get ready to come to us—as they will in God's own good time—then you will want our aid, as you have on previous occasions—as you did in the case of Texas; and then you will appreciate how unwise it was to have made a stand upon your present weak and untenable position—a position which can do you no good, but may do your northern brethren infinite evil. To save the nationality of the Democratic party, this contest, which has been going on for some time between Democratic leaders and Know-Nothing leaders at the South, to prove which was the most exclusively devoted to southern institutions, must be abandoned, otherwise the Democratic party South will become as sectional as the Abolitionists and Republicans of the North. Sir, I claim to be one of the old Democratic guard; one of those who never gave an opposition vote; never knowingly varied the shadow of a shade from Democratic principles, or pandered in the slightest degree to Free-Soil prejudices; and I tell you plainly there are some things we have not the strength to do at the North, even if we had the disposition. Sir, if defeat followed the passage of a measure which we all agreed was founded upon a just principle, what may we expect from the unconditional admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, which nine tenths of the people of the free States hold to be a fraud, and at war with the plainest principles of justice and republican government?

Where are the men of the North who voted for the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in this House? I look around the Hall in vain for their familiar faces. Sir, they are not here. The gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE and Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] and myself are the spared monuments of mercy; being the only persons voting for the bill who have retained seats upon this floor. And in the Senate, I am told, but one northern man who voted for it has been reelected. Sir, the passage of that bill was followed by overwhelming defeat of the Democracy in all the northern States; but the popular sovereignty feature of the measure was fast finding favor with the people, and, with judicious management, the Democracy would soon have been restored to its former ascendancy in the free States. It was this feature, which lies at the foundation, and is the very corner-stone upon which our political institutions are built, THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE TO GOVERN AND OF THE MAJORITY TO RULE, which gave the measure value in the estimation of the people of the North. That doctrine was well understood by them, and was near and dear to their hearts. It was expected that the fullest and fairest opportunity would be given to the people of Kansas to determine what should be the character of their domestic institutions, and that they would be protected and secured in the enjoyment of this right; and had this been done I am sure the Democracy of my State would have been satisfied. It is not true that the northern Democracy are opposed to the admission of any more slave States. I distinctly assert that I do not know one Democrat, in all the North, who would not favor the admission of a State with a slavery constitution if it was the fairly and legally expressed will of the people of such State; and whoever asserts or insinuates to the contrary, grossly misrepresents the position of the northern Democracy. We have no intention of preventing the just expansion of the South, holding that there is room and verge enough for all in our present wide domain; and that, if there is not, we will, at the right time, and in the right way, expand our territorial limits. Our southern brethren may rest assured we have no intention of doing them injustice, but we must firmly adhere to correct principles. I stated long ago, in my place in the House of Representatives, that if Kansas presented herself for admission with a slavery constitution, ratified by a majority of her people, I would vote for her admission. I said so before my constituents, I say so here to-day; and I believe that this is the universal sentiment of the Democracy of the free States. I should do this, not because I love the institution of slavery, for I do not, but because it is a matter which each State or Territory ought to decide for itself.

Sir, those who are familiar with my political history know that there is no stain of Free-Soilism in my record; and this is more than can be said of your Van Burens and Dixes, and many other self-constituted leaders of the Lecompton Democracy, outside as well as inside, the walls of Congress. Why, sir, I was particularly struck with the fact, that of the six speakers at two recent Lecompton demonstrations of some note, not one of them could boast of a clear and consistent Democratic record of ten years standing; and yet these are the men who assume the right to arraign those who have consistently devoted their whole lives to the service of the Democratic party!

A late number of the Indianapolis Journal, the Republican organ of my State, says:

"If there is a man in Indiana that we should have been willing to bet would follow the President and slavery to any extreme, that man is WILLIAM H. ENGLISH, of Scott county. His devotion to his party, and to the recognized leaders of his party, has been the most prominent character in his composition. His district is intensely Democratic. It was one of the two that was not quite overflowed by the freshet of 1854. His precedents and surroundings, therefore, certainly justified the belief that he would stand by the regular organization to the last. But some influence has strengthened him to do right in spite of the power and prestige of the President, who, as he is incapable of heresy, necessarily makes the party he heads the 'regular organization.' He [ENGLISH] has firmly adhered to his principles, and seen his party drift away from him without apparent concern."

Well, Mr. Chairman, I plead guilty to being devoted to the Democratic party. Regarding as I do the principles of that party as the true principles of the Government, and best calculated to secure the happiness of the people, I have clung to it with unswerving fidelity under all circumstances. I do not mean to say that the Democratic party is always right upon all subjects; but I have thought, and still think, it more nearly so than any other political organization; and that, even if wrong on an isolated measure, I could do more good by staying in that party, and laboring to get it right, than in any other position. I respect and venerate the President of the United States; and it has been the earnest wish of my heart to sustain him in all things; and to that end I have waited patiently and listened attentively, hoping that some fact might be developed, or some argument presented, that would enable me to carry out his views in regard to this question, as I hope to do in reference to all others.

But, sir, all the facts and arguments presented, all the speeches I have listened to here, have only gone to show that the technicalities of the law may be on that side; not equity and justice. I thought it was the business of statesmen in the councils of the nation to look to GREAT POLITICAL FACTS, and that the quibbles and technicalities of law belonged to lawyers, and were mainly used to defeat the ends of justice. Sir, the great fact which stares the whole country in the face, and which no fair man can deny, is that the Lecompton constitution does not embody the will of the people of Kansas, and that they do not wish it imposed and fastened upon them as their organic law. Sir, this is a fact, known of all men; and all this special pleading to evade it, because the technicalities of the law are supposed to be on the other side, partakes too much of the spirit of a Shylock, who exacts his pound of flesh because "it is so nominated in the bond." The whole country knows that a very large majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to that constitution; and this being so, are we to lend our aid in fastening it upon them, because there have been some irregularities there, and some culpable failures on the part of a portion of the people to exercise the right of suffrage? This I conceive to be a substantial statement of the question.

But it is said that the delegates to the convention were fairly chosen; and that, because the free-State men abstained from voting, therefore Kansas ought to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution. Well, sir, let us see how much fairness there was in this election of delegates; and I will premise by saying that I have seen two statements touching this subject, one signed by a certain H. Clay Pate, who will be remembered by a portion of my constituents as the same shallow Pate who made a speech in Jeffersonville on the night preceding the congressional election in 1854, denouncing the Democracy, urging a union of the Republicans and Know Nothings, and inciting them to keep foreigners away from the polls by force, if necessary—advice which was literally carried into execution. Sir, I have no confidence in his statement. The other is the statement of the ex-Governor of the Territory, and is so entirely corroborated by other evidence, that I think it cannot be successfully controverted. In speaking of the Lecompton constitution, he says:

"That convention had vital, not technical defects, in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment—as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses—by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly-organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken, and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates, based upon such census; and, in fifteen of these counties, there was no registry of voters.

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not and did not give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention. And here I wish to call attention to the distinction, which will appear in my inaugural address, in reference to those counties where the voters were fairly registered and did not vote. In such counties where a full and free opportunity was given to register and vote, and they did not choose to exercise that privilege, the question is very different from those counties where there was no census or registry, and no vote was given, or could be given, however anxious the people might be to participate in the election of delegates to the convention. Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for wherever they endeavored, by a subsequent census or registry of their own, to supply this defect occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention.

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger majority at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last."

But suppose, for the sake of argument, that the election of delegates, and everything up to that time, were all fair and proper: does it follow that the action of such delegates was to be final, without being submitted to the approval or disapproval of the people? Now, I am a firm believer in the sovereignty of the people, but I am not one of those who hold that sovereignty is inalienable, or, at least, that the people may not confer power and authority upon delegates to act for them, and bind them by such action; but, then, I hold that this is a power not to be exercised upon a mere implication; and that if it is not expressly granted, it is a power reserved by the people. A constitution is not like an ordinary act of legislation. It is the highest political law of the State, and the most important and solemn act of human government; and therefore the one in which the power of the people to pass judgment upon it before being put into execution, ought to be the most carefully guarded; and, if I understand the spirit which pervades the Constitution of the United States, and which underlies all our republican institutions, it is, that powers not expressly delegated, are reserved to the people, and that they are the true source of all political power.

Now, in this case, if we should even admit the legality of the Legislature calling the convention, and of the election of the delegates, the question still remains, what were these delegates authorized to do? If I understand the question, it is not at all as some gentlemen here seem to suppose. It is not as to the absolute necessity of an enabling act, nor as to whether the people may not delegate to representatives the power to make and put in operation a constitution, without its being submitted to a vote of the people; but it is whether they did delegate that power, and if not, whether there is satisfactory evidence that they approve or acquiesce in the assumption of that power by the convention? Admit the Lecompton delegates were authorized to form a constitution: were they authorized to give that constitution vitality, and fasten it upon the people, without their ratification and against their will? Was not the right to ratify or reject a power reserved to the people? If the members of the Lecompton convention possessed any such power as is claimed for them, show me when, and where, and how, it was conferred. Sir, the sovereign people of Kansas conferred no such power. They expected nothing of the sort; nor did the people of the States, the President, or his Cabinet. On the contrary, the President's instructions to Governor Walker, and the Governor's repeated declarations, were to the effect that "the constitution" (not a part of it only) ought to be, and would be, submitted to a fair vote of the people. The whole country expected it. On the 7th of July last, the Washington Union stated that—"There can be no such thing as ascertaining, clearly and without doubt, the will of the people of Kansas, in any way except by their own direct expression of it at the polls. A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents to be anything but a fraud."

Many of the delegates publicly pledged themselves that it should be submitted. Here is one of the pledges published before the election. Read it, and then say whether, under all the circumstances, the refusal of that convention to submit the constitution to the people was not a trick and a fraud which just men everywhere should condemn and refuse to carry into execution?

"To the Democratic Voters of Douglas County:

"It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which were adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN,
W. S. WELLS,
L. S. BOLLING,
WM. T. SPICELY,

A. W. JONES,
H. BUTCHER,
JOHN M. WALLACE,
L. A. PRATHER.

"LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, June 13, 1857."

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

Sir, if the delegates at that convention were empowered to act at all, it was only to prepare the constitution, and report it to the people for their ratification or rejection, and not to fasten it upon them, without any reference to their will. We daily refer subjects to committees of this House, to be considered and matured, because it is more convenient and practical to consider a subject by a few men than by a large body of men; but we do not regard the action of such committees as final. If they report a bill, we pass it or reject it, as seems to us best for the public good. Sir, your convention is but a committee, chosen for convenience sake by the sovereign people, (and, in this instance, by only a small minority of them), and charged with the preparation of a constitution for consideration only, and not to put it into execution, unless that power has been conferred in express terms. True, if the power should be assumed by the convention, the people may acquiesce in it; and I know there are instances where constitutions have been adopted without being submitted to a direct vote of the people, and where no express power to bind was conferred upon the delegates; but in every one of these cases, the constitution clearly embodied the public will; the acquiescence of the people was notorious, or else, from their silence or other cause, their approval was fairly to be inferred. How different these cases from the one under consideration! Besides, when these examples occurred, restrictions upon the expression of the will of the people, in the shape of provisos and Missouri compromises, were much more in vogue than they are in this day of light and knowledge.

I am not aware of any such example since the passage of the compromise of 1850, which was the beginning of a new era—the overthrow of restrictive legislation, and the inauguration of the great republican principle, since adopted and confirmed in the Kansas-Nebraska act, of the sovereignty of the people of the organized Territories, and that Congress should only interfere to the extent of securing to such people the free exercise of their just rights, and of carrying into execution their will. When admission is asked into the Union, Congress should inquire whether the constitution presented is the act of the people of such Territory. If it is not the act of her people, and does not embody their will, it is not republican; for republican governments, as we are told in the Declaration of Independence, must derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. What is the correct method of ascertaining the will of the people of a Territory? The "correct principle" is embodied in the act passed at the last session of Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be submitted to a fair vote of the people. This is the opinion proclaimed in the annual message of the President to Congress, at the beginning of the present session. The President says:

"I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State, may be followed on future occasions. I took it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded, as it is, on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

Now, to this sentiment of our worthy President, that constitutions "should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people," I give my most hearty concurrence; and I am at a loss to know why gentlemen on this floor are unwilling to apply it to Kansas, "founded as it is on correct principles." Why should not "correct principles" be applied to Kansas as well as to Minnesota and the other Territories? In what has she offended, that she should be denied the benefit of legislation founded upon "correct principles?" Sir, I have been taught that it was wrong to abandon principle for expediency, and that, when I knew a thing to be right, I should carry it out, no matter what the consequences to myself. If gentlemen on the other side of this question agree with me that the President was right in proclaiming the true doctrine to be that constitutions, framed by a convention of delegates, "should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people," then the only difference between us is, that they hold to one thing and do another, whereas I am for carrying into execution that which I believe to be correct; and if I am to be struck down for this, I shall at least maintain my own self-respect and the approval of my own conscience, and have the high authority of the President of the United States for saying that I shall fall in defense of "correct principles."

Sir, it was wise and patriotic and just for the President to instruct Governor Walker "in general and unqualified terms," "in favor of submitting the constitution to the people" of Kansas; and had this Democratic policy been adhered to, the present bitter cup would have been passed from us. It was a departure from these instructions that has occasioned all the trouble.

Am I to be told that the submission of the slavery clause to a vote on the 21st of December was a substantial compliance with the doctrine of popular sovereignty? I am notable, Mr. Chairman, to see it in that light. Sir, the Kansas-Nebraska bill provided that the people should be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." Negro slavery is not the only domestic institution, or the one, in my judgment, the most sacred. I always heard that the relation of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, and many others, near and dear to every civilized community, are "domestic institutions;" and that the people ought to have a voice in forming and regulating them; but this great right has been denied them under the Lecompton constitution. They were to vote on the slavery clause, but nothing else. Was that right? Suppose the constitution had expressly sanctioned polygamy, or any other monstrosity: were they to have no voice in voting the foul thing down? Were they to swallow all, and content themselves with the poor privilege of voting on slavery? Sir, this pretended submission was in reality no submission at all. In the language of the Democratic Executive of that glorious old Commonwealth which has been denominated "the mother of States and of statesmen,"

"It was ex parte; it was all on one side; it was, in gambling phrase, the foul 'heads I win and tails you lose'; the constitution was obliged to be adopted, with the clause or without the clause; the vote was bound to be 'for the constitution,' it was all pro and no con, and we say that was no submission to an election at all. Election is choice of alternatives, to adopt or reject; to reject as well as adopt, to adopt as well as reject.

"There was no choice in this case, and no equality of voters in the case. Three men went to the polls: A said, 'I vote for the constitution, with or without the clause;' but B and C said, 'We vote against it, with or without the clause.' A's vote was counted, B's and C's were not to be counted; and thus one was made not only to offset two, but to be sole substitute in fact for three against the majority of two to one out of three. Now, this was but the unvalued trickery and shameless fraud of a so-called schedule. There was neither right nor justice in it."

No, Mr. Chairman, it was not a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people at all, neither was it a fair submission of the slavery clause. It was a trick and a fraud from beginning to end, for, even had a majority voted against the slavery clause, the constitution was so framed that slavery would still have remained a permanent institution in the State.

I understand there are now many hundred slaves in Kansas; and from the following provisions which would have remained in the constitution, even if the slavery clause had been voted down, it will be seen that they and their descendants would have remained slaves forever:

"The right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with.
"No alteration shall be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves."

I have no doubt it was for these reasons, in part, that the free-State men declined to vote on the 21st of December. They considered the denial to them of the privilege of voting upon the whole constitution a fraud upon their rights, and the pretended submission of the slavery question as a mockery and a cheat.

But, sir, there is another reason why they did not vote on that day, which I now propose to consider, and which I conceive to be one of the most important features of this whole case.

We are told by the President, in his message accompanying the Lecompton constitution, that "the will of the majority is supreme and irresistible, when expressed orderly and in a lawful manner; it can unmake constitutions at pleasure." Now, for the sake of argument, let us suppose that everything was regular up to the 21st of December, and that the legal inference from the vote on that day was that the Lecompton constitution embodied the will of the people of Kansas, and then let us apply the President's doctrine, just quoted, to events which have subsequently transpired, and I think we shall find not the least trouble in coming to the conclusion that the people of Kansas, "in an orderly and lawful manner," have unmade the so-called Lecompton constitution, and are not asking admission into the Union under it; and that the free-State men are not so censurable, after all, for not voting on the 21st of December. Sir, it is well known that, before that day arrived, the acting Governor of the Territory convened the Territorial Legislature, and that Legislature passed an act submitting the Lecompton constitution fully and fairly to a vote of the people, on the 4th day of January. The free-State men very naturally preferred voting on the 4th, when they could vote on the whole question, under a fair law, passed, without dispute, by their own representatives, rather than on the 21st, which was provided for by delegates of questionable authority, representing, at best, but a fragment of the people, and which only provided for a vote on one clause of the constitution, and that unfairly submitted. Still, I think it would have been better to have voted upon both occasions; but I have no doubt the free-State men were influenced, to a great extent, by the considerations to which I have alluded.

In speaking of the free-State men in this connection, I mean those who were for law and order, and not those factionists, headed by Jim Lane, and men of that class, whose chief object was to produce confusion and mischief; who live upon agitation, and who are justly responsible for most of the trouble in that Territory. The fault is not in the Kansas-Nebraska law itself; for that law, faithfully executed, would secure peace and happiness to the people, as it has done in Nebraska; all the trouble in Kansas can be traced to a violation of the letter or spirit of that Kansas-Nebraska bill, and not to the bill itself.

The election of the 4th of January was provided for by a wise and just law, emanating from the proper law-making power of the Territory; and it will be seen by reading the following section, that the whole question was fairly submitted:

"Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, as follows:

"SECTION 1. That an election shall be held on the first Monday in January, A. D. 1858, between the hours of nine o'clock, a. m., and six o'clock, p. m., at which all the bona fide male inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas, over twenty-one years of age, who are citizens of the United States, or who have declared (on oath) their intention to become such, and who shall have resided in said Territory thirty days next preceding said election, and ten days in the county wherein said persons offer to vote, may vote for the ratification or rejection of the constitution adopted by the late constitutional convention at Lecompton, organized under the act of the 19th of February, A. D. 1857, entitled 'An act to provide for the taking of a census and election of delegates to a convention.' The voting shall be by ballot, as follows: Those voting for said constitution with the article entitled 'slavery,' shall cast a ballot with the words, 'For the constitution framed at Lecompton, with slavery;' and those voting for the constitution and against the article entitled 'slavery,' shall cast a ballot with the words, 'For the constitution framed at Lecompton, without slavery;' and those voting against the constitution shall cast a ballot with the words 'Against the constitution framed at Lecompton.'"

The same Legislature made stringent provisions to prevent fraudulent voting, all of which were approved by the Governor, and, apparently, by the Administration at Washington. On the 23d of December, General Cass, the Secretary of State, wrote to General Denver, the Governor of Kansas, as follows:

"Every person entitled to vote on the constitution ought to have safe access to the polls, and be free from all restraints whatever in the exercise of the elective franchise.
"The Territorial Legislature was doubtless convened on the 7th instant, and while it remains in session its members are entitled to be secure and free in their deliberations. Its rightful action must also be respected.

"Should it authorize an election by the people for any purposes, this election should be held without interruption, no less than those authorized by the convention."

In accordance with the spirit of these instructions, General Denver, on the 26th of December, issued a proclamation to the people of Kansas, in which he alludes to the fact that the "constitution is also to be submitted to a vote of the people on the 4th proximo, by an act of the Legislature approved December 17, 1857;" and goes on to say that "it is the anxious desire of the President that the approaching elections shall be fairly held, and that every one shall have free access to the polls without being subjected to violence or intimidation." It will be observed that the instructions of General Cass, and the proclamation of Governor Denver, were written after the 21st of December, and therefore applied, not to the election on that day, but expressly to the one to be held on the 4th day of January.

Here, then, was an election held in pursuance of a law which all must admit was fair and just in its provisions. It was an election recognized by the President, by the Secretary of State, and by the Governor of Kansas. It was an election fairly conducted, and at which there was a large vote of the people, as will be seen from the following proclamation, made by the Governor:

In accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act submitting the constitution framed at Lecompton under the act of the Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, entitled 'An act to provide for taking a census and election of delegates to a convention,' passed February 19, A. D. 1857," the undersigned announce the following as the official vote of the people of Kansas Territory on the questions as therein submitted on the 4th day of January, 1858: Against the Lecompton constitution, 10,326; for the Lecompton constitution with slavery, 138; for the Lecompton constitution without slavery, 24.

Some precincts have not yet sent in their returns, but the above is the complete vote received to this date.

J. W. DENVER,
Secretary and Acting Governor.
C. W. BABCOCK,
President of the Council.
G. W. DEITZLER,
Speaker House Representatives.

January 26, 1858.

Now, according to Calhoun's returns, the vote cast on the 21st of December stood, for the constitution with slavery, 6,140; for the constitution without slavery, 560. Of this number over three thousand are said to have been fraudulent votes; but even admitting them all to be legal, it will still be seen that there is a very large majority of the people of Kansas against the Lecompton constitution.

I hope I shall be pardoned for saying that I conceive the attempt made to show that the people of Kansas recognized and approved the Lecompton constitution, because a portion of them voted for State officers on the 4th, is too feeble and frivolous to require comment. The free-State men who did vote, voted under protest, and for the sole purpose of covering the contingency of that constitution being forced upon them by Congress; and at the same time they voted against the whole constitution, by over ten thousand majority, thus expressly precluding any inference of favor, which might be drawn from the vote for State officers. It sounds strangely inconsistent to me, to hear gentlemen contend that Kansas should come in under the Lecompton constitution, because the free-State men did not vote on the 21st of December; and, in the next breath, that she should be admitted, because a portion of them did vote on the 4th of January. It is too much like the old story, "I'll take the turkey, and you may have the crow; or you may take the crow, and I'll have the turkey." There is no fairness in it.

Here, then, at this 4th of January election, we find the undoubted will of the people of Kansas "expressed orderly and in a lawful manner;" and if "the will of the majority is supreme and irresistible," and "can unmake constitutions at pleasure," it seems to me that our duty is plain in relation to this matter. I think we should regard the Lecompton constitution as "unmade," repudiated, rendered null and void; and (as in the case of Minnesota) adopt legislation based upon the "correct principles" alluded to by the President in his annual message. I believe this would be the shortest and surest and best way to settle the whole question, and secure peace and harmony to the country. I prefer this plan; but it does not follow that I may not, as a last resort and a choice of evils, go for some other. I have heard other plans mentioned, which, under such circumstances as I have just stated, I might be induced to go for; but they all look to the ascertaining and carrying out of the will of the people of Kansas. I deeply sympathize with the President in his desire to get rid of this question, and would be inclined to make any reasonable sacrifice to secure that desirable result; but I do not believe agitation and strife will ever cease until the constitution is made to conform to the will of the people of Kansas. I do not wish to make sacrifices which, so far from securing peace, will tend to add to the discord already unfortunately prevailing.

I am not one of those who believe that unqualified admission under the Lecompton constitution will localize the agitation of the slavery question and restore peace to the country. No one will rejoice more than I, should this be the result; but my fear is, that these expectations are not to be realized. This is not the first time that I have heard there was to be an end of slavery agitation, but that point I think will not be attained by forcing the Lecompton constitution unconditionally upon the people of Kansas against their well-known and clearly expressed will. Sir, will it not be the signal for such agitation as the country has never known, and instead of withdrawing troops from Kansas for the service in Utah, will not still more troops be required to aid the two thousand pro-slavery men in Kansas to force the institution of slavery down the throats of the fifteen thousand free-State men in that Territory?

If so decided an expression of the people's will as that of the 4th of January is to be totally disregarded, what reason have we to rely upon the mere declaration that the will of the people of Kansas "is supreme," and that they "can unmake constitutions at pleasure?" I think with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GROESBECK], that, "if the majority can overturn a living, binding constitution, regardless of its provisions, it would seem that the same majority have some control over a constitution not yet vitalized, and which, as yet, is but inchoate, and vests no rights."

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not going into the abstract question of the right of the people to change their organic law at any time; but I do say that the regular and proper way to do so is in the manner and at the time pointed out in the constitution itself. The Constitution of the United States points out the way in which that instrument may be amended; and what a dangerous doctrine it would be to assert, that it might be amended in some other and different way. We all remember how Governor Dorr and his followers were denounced as rebels and traitors for making some such attempt in Rhode Island.

And again, who knows what is the political complexion of the Kansas State Legislature? I have no confidence in John Calhoun; and, until it is officially proclaimed otherwise, shall believe it is his intention to return a majority of Lecompton men elected. Under this state of the case, what assurance have we that the voice of the people will not be stifled if they again attempt to declare against or alter the Lecompton constitution? Will they not be denounced as traitors and rebels, and forced to submit at the point of the bayonet? The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR], who addressed the committee this morning, and who may justly be regarded as a southern leader and exponent of southern opinions, has frankly told us that if Kansas is admitted under the Lecompton constitution, he holds that it cannot be changed before 1864. The utter disregard paid to the vote of the 4th of January; the fact that many southern men already deny that the constitution can be changed before 1864; and, in fact, the whole past history of Kansas, lead me to distrust the efficacy of these abstract assertions, that the people have the right to change their organic law at any time.

If it is true, as I believe, that a majority of anti-Lecompton men have been fairly elected to the Kansas Legislature, let that fact be at once officially proclaimed, and then reduce your abstract assertions to a tangible and practical shape, and put it as a condition in the act of admission, securing beyond all reasonable question a fair expression of the will of the people whenever they see proper to exercise it in a lawful manner, and providing for carrying that will faithfully into execution, no matter what it may be; and then we shall have more confidence that the public will is not to be trampled in the dust; and, for one, I shall be induced to hope that it may lead to such a solution of the trouble as will at least be acquiesced in by the Democratic party generally. I am not one of those impracticables who cling to mere abstractions; who disregard entirely party obligations and the pressure of circumstances; who pay no deference to the judgment of others, or "hate the word compromise." On the contrary, I should feel myself at liberty to choose the least of two evils, if forced to choose between them at all; and I frankly declare that I should rejoice to see such an adjustment of this question as would tend to harmonize the Democratic party, save its nationality, and prevent its defeat, North or South; and I am not without hope that this desirable result might be attained, if gentlemen here would set about it in earnest, and in the right spirit. Proscription, however, will not secure it, nor will misrepresentation or denunciation.

Sir, I know that hot-headed and indiscreet men are endeavoring to make this question override all others, and, in the most uncharitable and intolerant spirit, would, if they could, "crush out" every thing like independence of thought and action in relation to it. Sir, no course could be more unjust, more unwise, or better calculated to do serious and irreparable injury to the Democratic party and the country. You well know, Mr. Chairman, that it seldom happens that the views and opinions of a Representative of the people agree entirely, and upon all questions, with those of the Executive, and that a difference of opinion upon an isolated measure is not regarded as proof of party abandonment. To enforce a different rule would be to destroy the very essence of representative government. This Congress has been in session but a short time, and yet several marked instances have been developed where Democratic Representatives and Senators have differed with the Administration upon important questions, involving great principles too, but without for a moment having their party fidelity suspected. It is but a few days since the recommendation of the President in reference to an increase of the Army was voted down by a Democratic Senate.

It is well known that a considerable number of southern Democrats on this floor, perhaps a majority, take issue with the President's views in relation to the constitutionality and expediency of extending Government aid to the construction of a railroad to the Pacific; but I have not heard that such gentlemen are, for that reason, to be read out of the Democratic party. Neither have I heard that those gentlemen are to be read out who could not join with me in sustaining the President's policy in relation to our neutrality laws and the Walker expedition. I might mention other cases, but these will suffice. Is it intended to have one rule applicable to gentlemen from the South, and a different one for those who happen to hail from free States? I cannot believe it. I have too much confidence in the wisdom and justice of this Administration to believe that any Democrat is to be proscribed, or even allowed to lose caste, because he cannot, in justice to his own convictions of right, and in justice to the undoubted wish of his constituents, vote for the unqualified admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. But we shall see.

Sir, the Democracy of Indiana have great confidence in the patriotism and prudence of James Buchanan. He was their first choice, as he was my first choice, at the Cincinnati convention. Indiana was the only northern State that gave him, at the presidential election, a decided majority over the combined enemy. She gave him a larger majority even than his own loved Pennsylvania. But notwithstanding the devotion of the Indiana Democracy to him, I believe that if his Administration should, unfortunately, be induced to make the unqualified admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution the paramount question and chief test of party fidelity, and should attempt to proscribe and crush out Democrats who differ with him in relation to this particular subject, and this particular subject only, that then the Democratic party, not only of Indiana, but of the great northwest, would be overwhelmed with disappointment and sorrow that the President of their choice should have been induced, by unwise counsels, to adopt a policy so cruel and unjust, and so well calculated to prostrate the Democratic party in all the free States.

But, it is said the Republican members are all going to vote against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; and I have been asked the question, with rather a triumphant air: "Are you going to vote with the Republicans?" When a Lecompton man asks me this question I answer it by asking another, "Are you going to vote with the Know Nothings?" and this, I find, brings the account to an exact balance, as that party here sustains the Lecompton constitution. Now, sir, I have no affinity whatever with Abolitionism, and just as little with Republicanism, I apprehend, as any Democrat upon this floor; but I am not going to desert a just principle because Republicans see proper to come to me in its support. A pretty doctrine, truly, that Democrats are to forsake a Democratic principle just as soon as Republicans come to its aid; thus putting it always in the power of the Opposition to place us on the wrong side of every question. Everybody knows that the Republican party, in the late canvass, was against popular sovereignty. I was for popular sovereignty then, and I am for popular sovereignty now. I have not changed. I have not got upon any new platform. I do not purpose to get upon any new one. I stand where I always have stood, upon the old-fashioned Democratic platform, and shall certainly not desert it because Republicans choose to leave theirs and come to mine.

I want neither new planks added nor old ones taken out, and especially in reference to the following resolution:

Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

I take the platform as it came from the hands of the Cincinnati workmen, and am neither to be frightened or driven from it, no matter how great the pressure. But, sir, there is nothing in that platform, or in any article of the Democratic creed, now, or in times past, that would justify me in aiding, directly or indirectly, the unconditional admission of a State under a constitution repudiated by her people. That would not be Democracy, and never can receive my sanction. Having said thus much upon the subject in reference to its general bearing, I now propose to say a few words more particularly applicable to Indiana.

Sir, the Democracy of my State met in convention on the 8th of last January, and adopted a platform, in which I fully acquiesce, although I think it would have been well to have made an expression of opinion in reference to several matters of State policy which seem not to have been considered. One of the resolutions adopted is in the following words:

"Resolved, That we are still in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and that by a practical application of that doctrine the people of a State or a Territory are vested with the right of ratifying or rejecting at the ballot box any constitution that may be formed for their government; and that hereafter, no Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State without a fair expression of the will of the people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application for admission."

To this resolution I give my most hearty approval. An unfortunate and ill-timed attempt was made in this city and elsewhere to destroy the force and effect of this resolution, first by declaring that it was not passed at the regular convention, but at an irregular meeting held afterwards; and, then, when that was overthrown by positive evidence, the same parties endeavored to make out that it had no application to Kansas; or, in other words, that it did not mean what its language clearly expressed. This effort, on the part of the Republican press of my State, and a small portion of the Democratic party, has proven entirely fruitless. It was a popular-sovereignty resolution, in letter and in spirit, and intended to apply to Kansas; was advocated as such; was opposed as such, and as such was passed by the convention. The candidates nominated by the convention have published a card, in which they say they so construe the resolution, and stand upon it with that construction. It will thus be seen that those who advocate the doctrine of popular sovereignty and oppose the Lecompton constitution, are within the regular, legitimate, Democratic organization of Indiana.

But I hope to think none the less of my Democratic brethren who take the other side of this question. I do not think it ought to be made a test of party fidelity; and though the intolerance of some in my State well deserves the fate of Haman, yet I am for exercising charity and forgiveness. To maintain our party in the ascendancy in Indiana, we must have harmony and concert of action. Without it, defeat is inevitable. We have no votes to spare, and must look to principles more, and to men less. We must see that our rulers are men of integrity—"honest, capable, faithful"—must rebuke immorality and corruption wherever found, and discourage the "rule or ruin" spirit, no matter in what quarter it may be manifested. There is too much talk of the party of this man and of that man. I hear much said of a Douglas party. Sir, I belong to no such party—but to the great Democratic party, whose watchword has ever been "Measures, not men." Let me express the hope that it will never be in Indiana as it was said to be in Rome, when Cæsar had a party, and Antony a party, but the country no party.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I think, before Kansas is admitted, her people ought to ratify, or at least have a fair opportunity to vote upon, the constitution under which it is proposed to admit her; at the same time, I am not so wedded to any particular plan that I may not, for the sake of harmony and as a choice of evils, make reasonable concessions, provided the substance would be secured; which is the making of the constitution, at an early day, conform to the public will, or at least that the privilege and opportunity of so making it be secured to the people beyond all question. Less than this would not satisfy the expectations of my constituents, and I would not betray their wishes for any earthly considerations. If, on the other hand, all reasonable compromises are voted down, and I am brought to vote upon the naked and unqualified admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I distinctly declare that I cannot, in conscience, vote for it. If for this honest conviction I am to lose the favor of southern gentlemen, or of the Administration, and am to be misrepresented and abused, so be it. I shall do my duty here as well as I know how, and return to the bosom of my generous and patriotic constituents with a clear conscience. They are neither place-seekers, or time-servers, but men of principle, and in their wisdom and justice I put my trust.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, it was my intention, as it yet would be my preference, to have forborne the expression of my views on this subject until the question of the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State was regularly brought to the notice of this House. But, limited as has been my experience in this House, it has sufficed to show me that opportunities of obtaining the floor are neither frequent nor certain, and that, if I relinquish it now, I may not again have the opportunity of proclaiming the sentiments which I entertain, the knowledge of which there are many who are entitled to have.

I look upon this question as one in which the peace of the Union is involved. I do not speak of its permanence, nor do I suppose that there is any real danger of its dissolution. But when its peace is disturbed; when, from one extreme to the other, there is strife, there is contention, there is violence and tumult, where there should be quiet; it becomes, Mr. Chairman, an unwilling Union, the value of which all begin to calculate, and what may follow some day is much more easy to be anticipated than pleasant to be considered.

This subject of territorial legislation has been at all times prolific of discord. It was at the time of the attempt, and the successful attempt, at the introduction of Louisiana into the Union as a State, that an eminent gentleman from Massachusetts uttered in the Hall of the House of Representatives what I have no doubt those who hear me have read with deep regret that it was ever uttered there:

"If this bill passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of this Union; that it will free the States from their moral obligation, and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation; amicably, if they can; violently, if they must."

There are some here, too, Mr. Chairman, who can well recollect the excitement and the painful anxiety occasioned, in 1819 and 1820, by the admission of Missouri into the Union. And now, when a similar boon is asked for her neighbor that was then extended to Missouri herself, no man of truth will deny that there exists, throughout the length and breadth of this land, a feeling of solicitude and excitement; and that there is amongst the extremists an almost sacrilegious joy at the recurrence of events calculated to jar and disturb the harmony of the Union, which a bold attack can never produce.

Since her organization as a Territory, Kansas has known no peace. Since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, Kansas has been the theater of strife and tumult. With everything to make her people happy and comfortable, with a richness of soil and purity of climate almost unequalled, it has been the scene of discord, of riot, of violence, and of bloodshed, and it is time now that these things should be stopped; Kansas calls upon us to stop them; the people of every State in the Union expect as much from us; and, Mr. Chairman, we must consider what is the effectual way of stopping it, and when we find that, we must apply the effective means, if we can do so, constitutionally, and in obedience to the recognized law of the land. Shall peace be restored by the Federal authorities, by the bayonets of the United States troops, by the more constant vigilance and attention of the soldiers or Federal officers, or shall it be restored by the people of Kansas herself? Shall she be thrown at once upon her own resources, and shall her citizens be told: "You shall be the conservators of your own peace, and if you are a law-abiding people—if you have a population, such as it has been boasted here over and over again that you have, we appeal to you to obey the law, to support the law, and to restore peace to your people in the State of Kansas?"

I shall proceed, Mr. Chairman, to show that the admission of Kansas into this Union under her present application, and with the Lecompton constitution, is regular, is according to established principle, according to recognized precedent, and according to what some gentlemen on this floor dare not deny is good authority. If this be so, and she has a republican constitution, I say we have no right, regarding the peace and interests of our citizens, to hesitate for one moment to admit her. I shall do little more than assert the principles that I maintain, using but little argument, but referring, perhaps, to a good deal of authority that ought to be recognized here, in support of them.

Was this territorial convention regular? Who disputes it? Does it require an enabling act? If it does, it has it. No man can read the Kansas-Nebraska act without seeing that there is an enabling act there. But does it require an enabling act? I tell the gentlemen upon this floor, who oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, that I will appeal to those who have on former occasions spoken for them, and by them I will judge whether it was regular or not. I will show the gentlemen who compose the majority of the Opposition that their views have been expressed in such a manner that they cannot now contradict them; while to those who compose its minority, I will cite the highest authorities recognized by any one of them.

Mr. Chairman, why should an enabling act be passed? Have the people the right to form a constitution or not? And if they have not the right, has Congress the right to bestow it upon them? I shall quote, upon this subject, my colleague from the fourteen district, [Mr. Grow;] and I cite him because, as the Republican candidate for Speaker, receiving more than eighty votes at the commencement of this session, he may be fairly considered the representative of their views and principles, as he was formerly the exponent of them. I cite him as good authority—as authority from which those who indorsed him at the commencement of the session cannot now dissent. What said he when the application was made to admit Kansas into the Union with a constitution framed without an enabling act—framed, permit me to say, by men in rebellion to the laws and with arms in their hands, to be used against the Federal authorities? When Kansas came here, with the constitution thus made at Topeka, he eloquently pleaded for her admission as a State, as a measure of peace; and in support of the regularity of her action, he said:

"The mode and manner of accomplishing it in organized States properly belongs to the forms of law, to be prescribed by the State government; but in the Territories, Congress is the only power that can prescribe the forms; for a territorial government emanating from Congress can be changed, modified, or abrogated, only by its consent. That consent, however, can be expressed as well after as before the action of the people. If Congress, then, has prescribed no form, whatever action the people think proper to adopt, in order to secure a change of government, provided it be conducted in a peaceable manner, is lawful and constitutional; lawful, because it violates no valid law—constitutional, because article first of the amendments to the Constitution secures to the people everywhere under its jurisdiction, the right, paramount to all law, peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

I want no better authority than my friend and colleague; and those who voted for him for Speaker of this House voted for him because they saw in him a proper representative of popular sovereignty, according to the doctrine he had expressed and they then maintained. But I have other authority; and I shall do little else than cite authorities, to which I wish the attention of those Democrats who, like the gentleman who has just spoken, [Mr. English,] have departed from us on this question. I have for those who, I am afraid, will not have the same confidence in my colleague that I have avowed, high authorities. I have the authority of Governor Robert J. Walker and of Mr. Secretary Stanton. They have said, in words and language not to be misunderstood, that the Lecompton convention was lawful. They have said that the act of the Territorial Legislature authorizing the convention was right; and they have warned the people over and over again, that, if they did not vote for delegates when they had the opportunity afforded them, on their own heads must be the consequences.

Mr. Stanton, on arriving in the Territory, addressed the people, saying, among other things:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention."

Again, in the message of the acting Governor in December last, and after what is now called the mischief had been done, he says:

"It thus appears that in the election of the 15th June last, for delegates to the convention, the great mass of the people purposely refrained from voting, and left the whole proceeding, with all its important consequences, to the active minority, under whose auspices the law had been enacted, and also executed, so far as that could be done by the executive officers, without the concurrence of the majority of the people."

"That the refusal of the majority to go into the election for delegates was unfortunate, is now too apparent to be denied. It has produced all the evils and dangers of the present critical hour. It has enabled a body of men, not actually representing the opinions of the people, though regularly and legitimately clothed with their authority, to prepare for them a form of government, and to withhold the greater part of its most important provisions from the test of popular judgment and sanction."

Governor Walker says very much the same. He says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency; and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

In many places he uses the same language. He says:

"If laws have been enacted by the Territorial Legislature which are disapproved of by a majority of the people of the Territory, the mode in which they could elect a new Territorial Legislature and repeal those laws, was also designated. If there are any grievances of which you have any just right to complain, the lawful, peaceful manner in which you could remove them, in subordination to the Government of your country, was also pointed out."

Again he says:

"In the case of Michigan, the Territorial Legislature were clothed by Congress with no authority to assemble a constitutional convention and adopt a State constitution; but that, under the comprehensive language of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, the Territorial Legislature was clothed with such authority by the laws of Congress, and that the authority of such a convention to submit the constitution to the vote of the people, was as clear and certain as that of Congress itself, and that opposition to such a proceeding was equivalent to opposing the laws of Congress."

Thus cursorily, Mr. Chairman, because it is not very important, I have referred to the authority of the leading men in the Opposition, to show that the territorial convention was properly created, and was a regular and lawful body. Now, what was it to do? It did not submit its proceedings to the people. It would have been better, perhaps, that it had. It is right on all such occasions to do so. But is there any law requiring it? And if there is no law requiring it, what guarantee have we that future legislation in that Territory will be better than the past? Shall we be told that there is any obligation of law requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people? If so, I will again refer to the authority of Governor Walker, to show that he distinctly told them, in advance of the election, that there was no such obligation.

Governor Walker says:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant, and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

"The only remedy rests with the convention itself, by submitting, if they deem best, the constitution for ratification or rejection, to the vote of the people, under such just and reasonable qualifications as they may prescribe."

We find, then, that there was no recognized law requiring a submission of the constitution to the vote of the people; and the question now is, Mr. Chairman, what was done, and how far did that meet the public expectation? Mr. Walker, as I have said, told them in advance that there was no power to compel the convention to submit their work to the vote of the people. And yet, with all that before them, those who are now called the majority in that Territory, absented themselves from the polls and refused to participate in the proceedings. What was the convention to do? I agree that it did not submit the constitution to the vote of the people. They were authorized to form a constitution, and they had the right to do so. The gentleman who has preceded me, [Mr. ENGLISH], has said that some of the delegates to the convention broke their party pledges; that they pledged themselves to a certain course of conduct and did not fulfill their promises. Agreed. Does that violate the law? Does that prevent the organic law going into effect in the manner prescribed in the instrument? But what did they do? They submitted to the people, not the constitution, but the question whether they should have slavery among them; and I believe that if the people had voted, under the circumstances to which I shall by and by allude, the constitution would not now contain that clause which to many in the floor of the House is so obnoxious.

Now I propose to show, by the same authorities, that the slavery question was the only question that divided the people of Kansas. I cite again my colleague, [Mr. GROW], to show that the slavery question was then, as it always has been, the only subject of division in that Territory. He said "the existence of slavery was the only question on which the people were divided; and the vote for delegates to the convention settled that by a majority of legal votes."

Mr. GROW. Will my colleague give the dates, if he pleases?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The 30th of June, 1856, when the Topeka constitution was submitted; which constitution, by the way, received, I believe, only some seventeen hundred votes.

Mr. GROW. Twenty-three hundred.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am reminded that my colleague was then chairman of the Committee on Territories; and that gives additional weight and emphasis to his statement. He spoke by authority. He stated this opinion on that occasion, and I do not believe he will deny it now. He has changed once, but I do not believe he will change in reference to this subject.

Mr. GROW. Whether I have changed or not is a question of fact.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will raise no question of fact between my colleague and myself. My colleague, on that occasion, further said, in reply to the inquiry of an honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TRIPPE]:

"I gave to the gentleman from New York the vote polled at the election immediately preceding the formation of the constitution. He knows, as well as any man, that the only question in Kansas on which the people are divided is, whether slavery shall exist there or not? That question was involved in the election of Delegate. He knows, too, that that is the only question to be settled."

It has not changed since then. If any other question has been raised since that time, I challenge any gentleman upon this floor to tell me what it is. If there is any other question on which the people of Kansas are divided, I ask any gentleman on this floor to rise in his place and tell me what it is. As it stood then, so it stands now.

Mr. GROW. If my colleague desires an answer, I will give it to him; though I do not like to interrupt him.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield the floor to my colleague for that purpose.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman inquires if there is any other question than that of slavery, of difference between the people of Kansas? That was at the first the great question of division between them, as he has stated; but, sir, since the invasion on the 30th of March, another question has arisen. They believed that at that time a government was forced upon them, which was illegal, by force; and since that time this question has, to a great extent, taken the place of the slavery question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The 30th of March of what year?

Mr. GROW. It was in 1855. It was then that this invasion occurred, which forced upon the Territory of Kansas a government which the people held that they were under no moral obligation to respect. This question has developed itself more and more, as the question of slavery has subsided. I believe gentlemen will agree with me on all sides that, after a certain time, it was generally conceded that Kansas could not be made permanently a slave State.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, sir, my colleague's speech was made fifteen months after the invasion; and the question of slavery he then said was the only question in issue. [Laughter.] He is good authority in this particular, and I like to quote him. But, sir, I have other authority, for I see that he is not satisfied with himself as authority on this question. I will back my colleague up with so much that he will not be ashamed of the position he then took. Governor Walker said:

"The President asked me to undertake the settlement of that momentous question [that means slavery] which has introduced discord and civil war throughout your borders, and threatens to involve you and our country in the same common ruin."

He tells them in another place that—"I cannot too earnestly impress upon you the necessity of removing the slavery agitation from the Halls of Congress and presidential conflicts."

And again:

"That in no contingency will Congress admit Kansas as a slave or free State, unless a majority of the people of Kansas shall first have fairly and freely decided this question for themselves."

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I would like to ask my colleague whether the question of slavery was ever submitted?

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the gentleman wants to know, I can tell him that it was submitted, and he cannot well deny it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I do deny it most emphatically. The question of the importation of slaves from other States was submitted, and was the only one submitted. The question of the existence of slavery there was never submitted. Slavery now exists in Kansas, and by that constitution is fastened upon the people of Kansas now and forever.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am glad my colleague has defined his position. We will know where to find him hereafter.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. There is no trouble in finding me at any time.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will show my colleague that the question of slavery was submitted to the people of Kansas. The constitution had been made, and the slavery question was the only one submitted. They were told that it would be submitted. They were told, they were warned, that if they did not vote, they delegated their rights to those who did vote. They were told by Governor Walker, they were told by Secretary Stanton, that such would be effect of absenting themselves and withholding their votes. They were never told that the constitution itself would be submitted to the people; for the Legislature had not undertaken to direct the convention to do it, but left it to the convention itself.

Why, sir, some years ago, in Pennsylvania, when it was undertaken to change the constitution of that State, when the law was passed by the Legislature for calling a convention, one of the most distinguished lawyers living, one of those who gave the fame and name of "a Philadelphia lawyer," which I am afraid those who came after do not so well deserve, objected to the law on the ground—and I trust I may be considered as reading it now, (Appendix A.)—because it undertook to tell the convention in what form the constitution should be submitted and adopted. The law provided that, after the convention had finished their labors, they should adjourn for four months, not to submit the question to the people, but so that the members could learn the will of their constituents, by familiar intercourse between the representatives and constituents, and then act in accordance. William Lewis put upon record his dissent to this feature of the law, on the ground that the Legislature, an inferior body, had no right to undertake to control the convention, a superior body, composed of delegates just fresh from the people—a direct emanation of the people. Will my colleague tell me why an inferior body should prescribe rules for the government of a superior body? Will he, with all his ideas of popular sovereignty, tell me what body he recognizes as higher than a convention of delegates selected by the people to frame a constitution for them?

I agree that the convention of Kansas ought to have submitted the constitution which they had framed to a vote of the people. I do not believe that it would have removed the difficulty, because, from the earliest moment, it seems to have been determined by the professing majority that they would have rule or ruin. Their absenting themselves from the polls was not accidental. It was the result of deliberation and combination; and now, forsooth, when things have been regularly done, and the convention has given to the people the decision of the only question which those high in authority have pronounced as the only one upon which the people differed, they turn round and say that a majority did not vote, and ask you if you will take that as an expression of the will of the majority, when only a minority voted.

I have some instances, with which my colleagues are familiar, in which a minority have made a constitution, and have amended it; and I say to them that, on almost every occasion on which the question of amending the constitution has been before the people of Pennsylvania, a majority of the people have not voted for it; but still it has been carried by the votes of a minority of the voters. When there is a contest about men, there is an anxiety of feeling; but when the contest is one of principle, of establishing organic law—men may talk as much as they please, but I put facts against arguments—the minority seem to control, for the majority do not vote. It may be that they did not feel an interest in the question; that they had no time, and perhaps no desire, to look into the question involved; or they have had confidence in those who prepared the constitution or amendments; but certain it is, for some reason, be it what it may, they failed to vote.

In 1855, the people of Pennsylvania were called upon to vote either for or against a constitutional convention, as they pleased. The same year, upon the same day, and at the same election, there was a contest for Governor. The number of people who voted for Governor was one hundred and ninety-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven—within two hundred and seventy-three of two hundred thousand. The votes in favor of calling a convention to revise the constitution were eighty-six thousand five hundred and seventy. What will gentlemen say to this. The convention was legally called. Nobody doubted the truth of the doctrine proclaimed by Governor Walker, that those who did vote controlled those who did not. Eighty-six thousand votes only, out of two hundred thousand voters, called that convention. We have another remarkable instance. When the new constitution was submitted and adopted by the people of Pennsylvania, in 1838, two hundred and fifty thousand one hundred and forty-six people voted for Governor, and yet the new constitution was adopted with only one hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-one voting for it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Had all the people the right to vote in the case of Kansas?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I know of none who were excluded from voting.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. There were nineteen counties in Kansas that had not the right to vote.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is begging the question. My colleague knows that those who do not choose to exercise their rights have no rights.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. They had no right.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It is very well to find a pretext when one wants to find fault.

Another instance has occurred in Pennsylvania, since my colleague has been a member of this Congress. While there were three hundred and sixty thousand votes polled at the election in 1857, for Governor, the highest vote polled both for and against the proposed amendments to the constitution was less than forty per cent. of that number. For one of the amendments the highest vote cast was one hundred and seventeen thousand one hundred and forty-three, and twenty-one thousand four hundred and twelve against it. One hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and fifty-three out of three hundred and sixty-three thousand and eighty-one voters in Pennsylvania adopted those amendments; and under those circumstances I have no doubt my colleague will acknowledge that the amendments have been adopted and are a part of the organic law of Pennsylvania.

Now, in the case of Kansas, if the election was a legal and a lawful election, those who stayed at home, as Governor Walker says, authorized those who did go to the polls to act for them. The convention having submitted to the people the only question in issue, and the people having voted upon it, it remains a part of the constitution.

I have thus shown, I trust, that there is no law requiring the constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people. If there is any such, I have not been able to find it. All principle, precedent, and, I was going to say, very much of practice is against it.

Now, let us consider what the constitution is. In the first place, is there a doubt that the people may wipe away every provision of it as with a breath? What is a constitution? A State constitution differs very materially from the national constitution. Gentlemen who cite the Federal Constitution, though upon the side I am endeavoring to sustain, are in error. The Congress of the United States can do nothing which the Constitution does not authorize. Our powers are limited; our hands are tied; and for what we do we must find our authority in the Constitution. In regard to a State constitution, exactly the reverse is the case. The members of a State Legislature may do every act of legislation which the constitution does not restrain nor prohibit. There can be no doubt about that; and I need cite no precedent for such a plain and recognized principle. When we came to form a Federal Constitution, it was accomplished by the surrender of certain powers by the States themselves. Not so, however, with a State constitution; it is a restraining instrument; and, if the constitution of Kansas has restrained either the people at any time, or the Legislature until after 1864, I have been unable to discover it. I say, too, if the restraint does apply, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] undertook to show, the constitution would not be republican, according to my notions.

Mr. Chairman, this clause of the Constitution, so much talked about, it seems to me has not been rightly applied. There are two or three clauses in the constitution of Kansas which we must look at in this connection. The clause which prohibits an alteration of the constitution until after the year 1864, operates only upon the Legislature; and it interferes in no manner with that other clause by which the right of the people is expressly reserved and recognized. I should contend for the right of the people at all events; but when gentlemen stand here and say that they are opposed to the admission of Kansas because the constitution is not a good one; when they are willing that this strife should continue in Kansas; I want to say to them —not that I expect to convince anybody, for I fear that we rush too blindly to conclusions on political matters for that—that there is in this constitution of Kansas an express recognition of the people's right to change their constitution when they please. Those gentlemen who undertake to say that they are restrained from doing so until 1864, fall into an error in confounding the application of that section with the section which applies solely and exclusively to the people. This right of the people is recognized every where. It is recognized in the Declaration of Independence, which declares the self-evident truth:

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

The constitution of Kansas recognizes it in the fullest possible manner, and that clause which relates to 1864 is operative only upon the Legislature, and in language so plain that no man can doubt, except those who choose willfully to do so.

Now, sir, those two clauses are not inconsistent. The one applies to the people and the other to the Legislature. This enumeration of rights says the constitution shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask my colleague a question, for I really feel some interest in his opinion upon this point. I understand him to say that the clause of the constitution forbidding a change before 1864 applies to the Legislature. I understand him to say that another provision of the constitution provides for a change by the people before 1864, or after, as the case may be.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Now, sir, what I propose to ask my colleague is in the way of a practical question: I find that the resolution of the Democratic convention of our own State, which has just adjourned, contends for this same power, and says the people have it by "regular process." Now, I want to know from him how he would propose that the people should exercise the power?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will tell the gentleman. They shall petition the Legislature, who shall authorize them to have a convention.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. But the Legislature have no power before 1864.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman is wrong. The Legislature have no power to propose legislative amendments before that time, and the restraint upon them is only of that kind. I have a number of precedents upon that point. The constitution of Pennsylvania imposes a similar restraint upon the Legislature; and yet my colleague will not rise here and tell us that the people of Pennsylvania are so restrained, and cannot have a convention.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I contend that they are not restrained. They have a high revolutionary right to change their government, just as the people of Kansas have; but it is not a right by "regular process."

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, I contend for the right by regular process. I want to put down the exercise of these revolutionary rights in Kansas. I want to substitute regular process for the strong arm of violence, with which the Territory has been too long governed.

Now, I will refer my colleague to a precedent. In 1776, Pennsylvania had a convention, over which Benjamin Franklin presided, and they framed a constitution which contained a clause in reference to the right of the people, in similar phraseology to the clause in the constitution of Kansas. And it contained another clause ten times as strong as the one in the Kansas constitution, which provided that there should be a council of censors, two thirds of whom should propose amendments to the people. (Appendix B.) Well, the censors met and would not propose amendments to the people. A majority were in favor of it; but not the requisite two thirds. They adjourned over till another year. The people then tried again to have their constitution amended by what they supposed was the only "regular process," but the council of censors again refused.

The constitution was defective in many things. It had some good things in it, but it was imperfect, and its radical defect was that it provided for but one branch of the Legislature. Well, when the council of censors refused to call a convention to propose amendments, or to propose amendments themselves, the majority of that council addressed the people, and, speaking of those who opposed the measure, said, "Their sullen no in this council cannot rob you of your birthright."

They did not consider it a gift, an acquired right; they claimed it as a born-right, a birth-right, of which they could not be deprived, especially by a clause operative only upon that council and ineffectual upon the people.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. That was revolution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir; it was not revolution; it was regular process. It was put upon the ground that there was a reservation in that constitution similar to the one here, and that that reservation was to be construed as I am contending that this ought to be construed now. The Legislature took the same ground. It was opposed then as it is opposed now. It was insisted that the "regular process" was the process of the council of censors. But the Legislature overruled that, and said, "You gentlemen who compose the council of censors may propose amendments, but the people have, at the same time, the right to amend or reform the constitution at their pleasure;" and the Legislature declared, and the people exercised this right. A constitution was framed in 1790; it had in it no clause providing for its change or amendment. Yet who dared to dispute the right of the people to have a change when they desired it? They have the right either to make an entire constitution or to amend the existing instrument.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is this clause in the constitution of Kansas?

"Sec. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall at its next regular session call a convention," &c.

Now, can any gentleman upon this floor contend that that section interferes with the other clause, giving to the people the right to amend their constitution?

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he holds that, where a power is granted, and the mode of executing it is prescribed, it can be exercised in any other mode except that prescribed?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Of course not; but I tell the gentleman from Ohio that there is express power granted to the people, and that there is no restriction upon the Legislature until after 1864. When you undertake to restrain a legislative body, and to deprive them of rights, you say it in words that cannot be misunderstood. I have the authority here, which the gentleman will recognize, of the Topeka constitution. [Laughter.] The Topeka-ites knew how to restrict the Legislature, when they wanted to do it.

I have said that this clause is operative upon the Legislature; but I mean to show that it is not operative until after 1864. Will the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] a good and eminent lawyer as he is, undertake to say that he is not familiar with law after law beginning, that after such a day such and such shall be the law? And will he rise here and assert that such will be the law until the day specified arrives? I will show the gentleman the language which is used when the object is to prohibit anything being done before or up to a given day. I read from the Topeka constitution, this Republican instrument which it is insisted shall be the basis of the admission of Kansas:

"Sec. 4. No convention for the formation of a new constitution shall be called, and no amendment to the constitution shall be, by the General Assembly, made before the year 1865, nor more than once in five years thereafter."

They recognized the difference between the two—the people and the Legislature. When conventions want to prohibit the exercise of that power they use language that cannot be misunderstood. If any one takes up the statute-books of the United States he will find hundreds of laws beginning, that from and after a particular day there shall be such law, and surely no member will argue before this body that before the time specified the law is operative or in force. I say that this clause in the constitution of Kansas is not of any effect whatever till 1864; although it may not have been so intended. The Topeka constitution is very different. It prohibits the amendment of the constitution effectually before the year 1865. If this clause was intended to have a different effect, its framers have overreached themselves. If it was intended for good, I can very well understand the argument that, having made a new constitution, and infallibility not being allotted to man, legislative amendments should be encouraged up to 1864; so that, by that time, experience might show its merits or defects. If the motive was bad, then these men have signally overshot their mark. I say you cannot take up the statutes of State Legislatures, or the acts of Congress, without finding hundreds of laws enacted that from and after a day such shall be the law; and if that has been construed to mean that the law should not go into effect till that time, I want to see the judge who would construe differently a restriction contained in this clause upon the legislative power.

I hold to the doctrine that the Legislature of a State has all the sovereign power, except such as is for necessary purposes reserved, either expressly or by implication, to the people. It is not new doctrine that I am enunciating here; but I have been astonished at the ground taken by some members in this matter. I do not know that they want, willfully, to pervert the condition of things; but the idea is absurd that, because a certain clause in a constitution declares that the Legislature shall be restricted, after a certain time arrives, from amending it, except in a particular way, that it is to be construed so as to restrain their action before that time arrives. Until after 1864 it is inoperative, as though it had been said that the clause should not be inserted in the constitution till that time arrives.

I quarrel with no man because he differs in opinion with me. I agree with the gentleman who last spoke in not deeming it essential whether this is made a party test or not. I believe that this constitution has been framed with all the requirements of recognized law; and I, for one, will never sanction the rebellion that created resistance to it from the moment of its inception. I have given the highest authority, among the opponents of the admission of Kansas, to show that it was regular in everything, down to its submission to a vote of the people. I have pointed gentlemen to the case of the constitution of my own State made in 1790, which was not submitted to the people, and it remained unaltered for forty-eight years. I have referred them to State after State, whose constitutions were not so submitted. The State of Indiana had a provision in her constitution that it should only be amended every twelfth year; but a new constitution was made in another year, and was accepted without a murmur of illegality. The man who would attempt to restrain the exercise of sovereign power by the people, would meet that doom which every public man would want to avoid.

Now, what do we gain by admitting Kansas with this Lecompton constitution? In the first place, do we violate any principle? If we do, I will not vote for it. Popular sovereignty! A great respect the professed majority in Kansas can have for popular sovereignty when they come here with their Topeka constitution, and say that the people of Kansas cannot and shall not amend their constitution for eight or nine years! Suppose this is a bad constitution! Suppose that it admits slavery, and that the people do not want it there! I do not believe that slavery can exist there; I have not an idea that it can; and as it cannot exist there as an institution, I should rather see it out of the constitution. I do not object to the existence of slavery in a State where the people desire it. I do not want it in my State; but I do not object to the fullest enjoyment of it in a State where the people desire its existence. But whether it is the slavery or any other clause that is obnoxious to the people, I put my finger on the clause that the people may alter their constitution when they think proper; and I challenge gentlemen to point to any clause which any plain, unlettered man would read, and say that it prohibits the amendment of the constitution at any time—immediately, if the people choose it.

These are the views that I entertain. Unlike the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] who preceded me, I have no apology to offer for avowing the principles adopted by the party to which I am proud to belong—that party through which alone the harmony of the country can be preserved. To me, it is immaterial whether this act shall, or shall not, be accompanied by a declaration or condition by Congress that the people shall have, at all times, the right of altering their constitution. You might as well declare that the sun shines; the two propositions are equally plain, without the declaration of them. I will vote for such a declaration, for it asserts expressly only what is there by necessary implication; and because, if there be any room for doubt, it will remove that doubt. I will vote for it in any way; either as a declaration, a proviso, or a condition; although I believe the right is there already. Recognizing the right of the people of Kansas to alter their constitution when they please; and recognizing the right of the Legislature, at any time, to propose amendments, if the people do not wish to go through the form of having the entire constitution changed, and if they are only dissatisfied on one clause; and entertaining the belief that the admission of Kansas into the Union is a measure of national peace, and that the strife which would follow its rejection would envelop and affect every man in the country; I most earnestly trust that calm counsels will prevail, and that the matter may be put in such a shape as the gentleman from Indiana has just hoped it might be, to command the votes of himself and others. I hope there may be no dissensions in a party on which depend the success and quiet of the country; and I promise gentlemen that, if that is done, there will be no more disaffection; because I do not believe that the people of Kansas are so suicidal or so fratricidal as to continue dissensions and discords when the Federal Government shall have removed its forces from the Territory, and relieved it from territorial dependence. If that be the result, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all will be satisfied who have contributed to bring it about. [Here the hammer fell.]

APPENDIX.

Resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient and proper for the good people of this Commonwealth to choose a convention for the purpose of reviewing and, if they see occasion, altering and amending, the constitution of this State.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this House, a convention being chosen and met, it would be expedient, just, and reasonable, that the convention should publish their amendments and alterations, for the consideration of the people, and adjourn at least four months previous to confirmation."

Protest of William Lewis.

"I dissent, because, although I admit, in the fullest extent, that it will be proper for the convention to submit to the consideration of the people the plan of government which may be formed, and, although I fervently wish that sufficient time will be afforded them to deliberate thereon, I am so far from being satisfied of the right of this House to enter into any resolutions respecting it, that I cannot but consider them as unwarrantable assumptions of power. The resolution agreed to must be intended to have some weight and influence with the convention, or it would not have been proposed; and as that weight and influence, so far as they operate, must tend to prevent the unbiased exercise of their own minds, in a matter submitted to them by the people, and not by this House, they must be highly improper. An adjournment by the convention is a thing in itself so desirable, that were its members to be appointed by this House, and to derive their authority from it, I should not only be for recommending, but directing the measure. But the convention must be chosen by the people, in whom alone the authority is lodged, and will derive all their powers from them. They will sit, and they ought to act, both as to adjournments, and in all other respects, independent of this House, and should not in the one case, any more than in others, be influenced by it. Being to be chosen by the same people with ourselves, it is rather assuming in us to suppose that their wisdom, virtue, or discretion will be less than our own, and unless we distrust their prudent exercise thereof, it does not become us, to whom the business does not appertain, to dictate to those to whom it belongs. They will doubtless receive from their constituents and duly respect such instructions and recommendations as they may think proper to give, but ought not to receive any from us, who, as a body, have no right to interfere, and who, as individuals, will have a voice with other members of the community.

"The people may think that an adjournment of four months is too long or too short, and may recommend as they may think proper; but we have no right to think or to act for them. If we have a right to resolve that an adjournment is proper, we must have an equal right to resolve that it is improper; or that any matter in the formation of the government is right or wrong, according to the prevailing ideas in this House. In our resolution respecting the election and the meeting of the convention, we are authorized by the wishes of the people, manifested to us; but we have no authority of our own, and are not warranted by them to proceed further. When the convention meet, they will look to the source of their authority for instructions and recommendations, both as to adjourning, and as to other matters, and act with a prudent discretion therein; and as that discretion ought not to be biased by any supposed influence of this House, I dissent from the resolution, as being calculated to intrench on the rights of the people and on the free deliberations of their representatives in convention, and have recorded my reasons in justification of my conduct."

From the Constitution of Pennsylvania, of 1776.

"In order that the freedom of this Commonwealth may be preserved inviolate forever, there shall be chosen by ballot, by the freemen in each city and county respectively on the second Tuesday of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, and on the second Tuesday in October, in every seventh year thereafter, two persons in each city and county of this State, to be called the Council of Censors, who shall meet together on the second Monday of November next ensuing their election; the majority of whom shall be a quorum in every case, except as to calling a convention, in which two thirds of the whole number elected shall agree, and whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the constitution has been preserved inviolate in every part; and whether the legislative and executive branches of government have performed their duty, as guardians of the people, or assumed to themselves, or exercised, other or greater powers than they are entitled to by the constitution; they are also to inquire whether the public taxes have been justly laid and collected in all parts of this Commonwealth, in what manner the public moneys have been disposed of, and whether the laws have been duly executed. For these purposes they shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records; they shall have authority to pass public censures, to order impeachments, and to recommend to the Legislature the repealing of such laws as appear to them to have been enacted contrary to the principles of the constitution.

"These powers they shall continue to have for and during the space of one year from the day of their election, and no longer. The said council of censors shall also have power to call a convention, to meet within two years after their sitting, if there appears to them an absolute necessity of amending any article of the constitution which may be defective, explaining such as may be thought not clearly expressed, and of adding such as are necessary for the preservation of the rights and happiness of the people; but the articles to be amended, and the amendments proposed, and such articles as are proposed to be added or abolished, shall be promulgated at least six months before the day appointed for the election of such convention, for the previous consideration of the people, that they may have an opportunity of instructing their delegates on the subject."

Reasons for dissenting from the call of a Convention.

"Because we are of opinion that this House is not competent to the subject. We are delegated for the special purposes of legislation, agreeably to the constitution. Our authority is derived from it and limited by it. We are bound by the sanction of our solemn oaths to do nothing injurious to it, and the good people of Pennsylvania have, in the constitution, declared the only mode in which they will exercise 'the right of a community to reform, alter, or abolish government,' as being the manner most conducive to the public weal.

"Because this measure at once infringes the solemn compact entered into by the people of this State with each other, to be ruled by fixed principles; will render every form of government precarious and unstable; encourage factions, in their beginning contemptible for numbers, by a persevering opposition to any administration, to hope for success; and subject the lives and liberties of the good people of this Commonwealth, and all law and government, to uncertainty; render everything that is dear subject to the caprice of a factious and corrupt majority in the legislature; destroy all confidence in our government; and prevent foreigners from giving that preference to Pennsylvania as an asylum from oppression which we have hitherto experienced."

Mr. FOSTER obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, who moved that the committee rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw that motion, and allow me to make a motion for an evening session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. No, sir. I am opposed to evening sessions.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope that course will be pursued. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to speak upon this question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I do not think there is any necessity of grinding out all these speeches on Lecompton in two or three days. I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 6, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, (at eleven minutes past four o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. C. GRANBERRY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Attorney General, detailing proceedings under the act of March 3, 1855, to improve the laws of the District of Columbia, and to codify the same; which was read.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, communicating the petition and papers of Aaron Weeks, heretofore referred to the court by an order of the Senate; which was read, and on motion of Mr. CHANDLER, leave was granted to Aaron Weeks to withdraw his petition and papers.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BIGLER presented three petitions of merchants and other citizens of Philadelphia, for the establishment of a line of mail steamers between that city and Brazil, touching at Savannah and certain places in the West Indies, as proposed by Thomas Rainey; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING presented the petition of John A. Pitts and Hiram A. Pitts, praying the renewal and extension of their patent for certain useful improvements in a machine for threshing and cleaning grain; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SEWARD presented two memorials of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the act of Congress establishing the light-house board; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of citizens of Oswego, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the act of Congress establishing the light-house board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented two memorials of citizens of Portland, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the act of Congress establishing the light-house board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented two memorials of merchants and others, citizens of New York and Brooklyn, praying for the adoption of measures for ascertaining the correctness of certain alleged discoveries of guano on Jarvis and Baker's Islands, in the Pacific ocean, the quality of the guano, and its accessibility to merchant vessels; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Venango county, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a mail route from Plumer post office to Titusville, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a memorial of citizens of Brunswick, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the act of Congress establishing the light-house board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John Drout, a pensioner of the United States, praying that his pension may commence from the date of his discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YULEE presented the petition of Joseph H. Wheat, a clerk in the Post Office Department, praying to be allowed a certain amount of salary, of which he alleges he was deprived without justice by the late Postmaster General; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAY presented a petition of M. E. Bradley and others, citizens of the United States and residents of the country known as the "Gadsden purchase," and the southern portion of New Mexico, praying for a separate territorial organization, under the name of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of John Brest for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of a law granting a homestead to actual settlers upon the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DURKEE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel Whitney, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 190) for the confirmation of a certain land claim in favor of Pierre Grignon, or his legal representative. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of citizens of Washington, and two memorials of the trustees of the public schools of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 191) for the benefit of public schools in the city of Washington. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Horace E. Dimmick, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Hays, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Ann E. T. Eldridge and the papers relating to the claim of Nannie Denman, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Robert Dickson, of the Kentucky volunteers, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF DECEASED SENATORS.

Mr. EVANS. Some time ago, a resolution to authorize the payment of their compensation to the representatives of Senators Bell, Butler, and Rusk, was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I am directed by that committee to report back the resolution, and to recommend its passage; and, at the same time, I submit a report which shows the reasons for that decision. I desire, also, that the resolution be taken up at once by the Senate, and disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, which was introduced by Mr. SEWARD, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the representatives of the late Senators Bell, Butler, and Rusk, who attended the special session of the Senate, convened by the President on the 4th of March last, and who have since died, compensation for the said Senators, respectively, at the rate of $3,000 per annum, from the commencement of said session to the time of their decease.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, which was reported by him on Monday last from the Committee on Printing, to print ten thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents, for the year 1857, on arts and manufactures.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish to state but one or two points in regard to this subject, and then I shall ask for the action of the Senate, which I hope we shall be able to get before the expiration of the morning hour. The whole body are familiar, at least to some extent, with the subject of public printing, and the abuses and extravagance that have attended it. The committee propose to cut down the number of copies of this document, printed by order of the Senate, from twenty-seven thousand to ten thousand. The saving that will be achieved by this reduction will be upwards of thirty thousand dollars. The number which will inure to each Senator for the purpose of distribution among his constituents will be about one hundred and thirty, supposing eight thousand to be printed for the use of the Senators; and, besides, we propose to furnish two thousand copies to the Interior Department, which may, under a proper system of distribution, dispose of them for the public good.

There is, then, a saving proposed by the committee to this extent. Gentlemen can give it what value and what consideration they please. If they cannot support the Committee on Printing in their efforts to reduce the expenditures which have been so enormous hitherto in this branch of the public service, the committee may come to the conclusion that they may as well cease to speak of the abuses of the system. The committee think that from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and thirty copies to each Senator are sufficient. We are now aware that a vast number of these Patent Office reports are lost altogether to the public service. Senators are aware of the fact that they can be bought throughout this city, at least in a number of places, for fifteen cents per copy. I am assured, since I made this remark the other day, that they have been repeatedly bought at a less price than that; and yet they cost Congress some seventy cents a volume to print them in the first place.

An amendment was offered on Monday by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] which he, at the proper time, will explain. I shall support the amendment, and I believe it ought to be adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. The cost of congressional printing has suddenly increased so largely as to be now a subject of serious interest to the whole country.

In 1847, only eleven years ago, the whole sum paid for paper, printing, and binding amounted only to $64,691 96. This was under the contract system, when the work was given to the lowest bidder. Some three or four years later, this system was changed, at the instance, mainly, of persons interested in high prices.

The new system was a mixed one. The prices were fixed by the law, and the Government under it has become the purchaser of paper and other materials. The office of Superintendent of Printing has been established, and that officer become a functionary of the Government, in many instances irresponsible to any authority, though nominally responsible to the Committee on Printing of each House. He buys the paper, orders the engravings, and controls the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

It is not my purpose to inquire into the manner in which the duties of that office have been fulfilled; much less is it my wish to impute willful wrong to any one connected with the management of the public printing. I desire only to draw the attention of the Senate to the enormous cost of the work, with the hope that the present committee will be sustained in their labors of retrenchment.

The cost of printing, paper, and binding, from July 1, 1856, to March 4, 1857, amounted to the sum of $1,258,210 42. The binding, alone, for that period, it will be seen, was more than six times as much as the whole cost of paper, printing, and binding for the year 1847.

The cost for the year just ended I have not been able to obtain; but it is probably over a million and a half of dollars.

A great deal of this extravagance of expenditure has arisen from the loose manner in which Congress has ordered the printing of reports by officers of the Army and Navy, and other functionaries sent upon exploring duties. It has been common, as I am told, to direct the printing of such reports without examination, permitting the officer to complete his report while the work is progressing in the hands of the Printer. Such has been the course with the Coast Survey, the Japan expedition, the Mississippi and Pacific railroad report, and many others.

The Coast Survey report cost, for printing and materials, for the year 1856, the enormous sum of $78,441 70.

Gilliss's report has already cost over one hundred thousand dollars; and the estimated cost of the whole work as ordered is $149,107 97.

The Japan expedition report, which has been completed and paid for, cost the sum of $240,486 72.

Of Emory's Mexican boundary report, one volume has been printed, and has already cost $107,580; the second volume has been ordered, and is estimated to cost $104,510—making, in all, the sum of $212,000 for that work.

But the Pacific railroad report is beyond all its associates in magnificence of price. Five volumes have been printed; four more are in the hands of the Printer. The work already done has cost $526,117; the balance is estimated to cost $335,300—making a total of $861,417; but the reality in the end will probably reach over a million.

Captain Wilkes's report was the first of the series of "splendid books" ordered by Congress; and by what I have shown, it will be seen to have been a plentiful mother of costly books. Its cost I have not been able to learn. The expedition under the command of that officer, which was conducted by him with great ability, was a favorite with the country; and in their gratitude, the Congress of the United States seemed willing to let him print the book to suit himself, and, I believe, to keep the copies when printed.

The Patent Office report has been a favorite of the country; and, like all favorites, it has been permitted to overgrow its proper dimensions. Originally one small and interesting volume of well-selected facts and tried opinions, it has become three volumes; one devoted to agriculture, and the others to inventions in the mechanic arts. It should be condensed if its usefulness is to be continued. Its cost for the year 1857 was $375,286. It cost the Government seventy cents a copy, and it can be bought in any number, I am told, in the bookstores of this city for fifteen cents—a pretty fair evidence that the number printed is much greater than the country needs.

The whole system of printing books by Congress I consider as wrong in principle, and productive of no good.

All the works which have been distributed by the Senate and House of Representatives, if they possess value, would be sought by the enterprising publishers of the country, and furnished to the people at much less expense. Beginning with Captain Wilkes's book, a rivalry has grown up for books of that class, with expensive and often worthless engravings, that no judicious private publisher would allow to incur their pages. Officers now think injustice is done to them, if Congress declines giving them authority to print and publish without control.

Until within the last few years, Congress printed only such matter as was necessary to the proper understanding of questions before them.

The new system has brought about this city and Congress a host of persons seeking this patronage; and the enormous sums expended have become an evil and an abuse which is attracting the attention of the whole country. The present Committee on Printing in the Senate propose to curtail the expenditure without at present interfering with the system; and I earnestly hope it will meet the hearty cooperation of this body.

Among the evils of this lavish expenditure for printing is one, not among the least, in the labor it imposes upon the members of Congress. It is not known abroad how much of each member's time is consumed in distributing this work. I consume hours daily in replying to letters claiming books, under the impression that they are furnished to us of all kinds, and without limit in number. All the books I have enumerated, except the Patent Office report, were distributed before I came here, and I answer twenty or more letters a day, asking for Perry's Japan, Gilliss's report, the Pacific railroad report, &c. When by accident I have procured a copy, from some friend or from the bookstores, to send among my constituents, it has been followed by many applications from other persons having claims upon my notice. No amount of printing could enable a Senator, representing any one of the larger States, to furnish each of his constituents with a copy of all the works called for, and an attempt to discriminate only gets him into trouble with his friends. The impression abroad is, that we are even more extravagant than we really are; and this impression sometimes brings an amusing letter. The other day, a good man wrote me that his son, a "smart boy," was fond of reading, and he hoped I would send him "some good story-books." [Laughter.] To-day I have a letter from a man who says he is a horse-doctor, who asks me for books to teach him his trade. [Laughter.] My inclination is to be civil to all; but no labor which I can perform will enable me to answer all the letters received asking for books. It is time the whole system should cease to exist.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the proposed resolution and amendment read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, in addition to the usual number, ten thousand copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents on arts and manufactures, for the year 1857, eight thousand of which for the use of the Senate, and two thousand for the Interior Department, for the purposes of official distribution.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON is to add:

And that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents on mechanics, hereafter to be made to Congress, to be prepared and submitted in such manner as that the plates and drawings necessary to illustrate each subject shall be inserted in their proper places in the text, so as to comprise the entire report in one volume.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend my own amendment by striking out the words "made to Congress," and inserting "made to the Senate."

Mr. STUART. It would be better to limit the number of pages also.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly have no objection to that. On looking over the mechanical report for last year, I find that it contains seventeen hundred and fifty pages. Now, I think the whole can be put in one volume not exceeding seven hundred and fifty pages.

Mr. HUNTER. And less than that.

Mr. WILSON. I concur entirely in the movement which has been made by the Committee on Printing. Members of Congress have come to be agents for the distribution of books, seeds, and documents. The Senator from Pennsylvania has told us the character of some of the communications which he receives in regard to this distribution of books in the country; and I may add that daily I receive letters asking for books, and some gentlemen are modest enough to ask for the whole list of all the works we have published for years past. This takes up a great deal of our time, to say nothing of the enormous expenses which have been incurred during the past few years in the publication of these books. I am ready to give my voice and my vote to the policy inaugurated by the committee, and I hope it will be sustained by the Senate, and by the House of Representatives. I am ready to begin here, upon a work that is probably of more interest to my own State than it is to any other State of the Union. I suppose there are more persons in Massachusetts who have an interest in this mechanical report, than can be found in any other State of this Union. The proposition is to make the reduction upon this work. I am ready to begin here, where it affects my own people. The agricultural report is of great interest in every section of the Union, and I suppose we shall be called upon from every section of the country to publish a large number of that work. That is in one volume; it is a work of great and general interest to the whole country, and we probably cannot stint that. But the interest in the mechanical report is confined generally to a few States. It is certainly a work of interest; but I think labor ought to be bestowed upon it, to condense its contents, and they will then be of infinitely more value than they now are, and the condensation will save a vast sum of money to the country.

I am in favor, therefore, of this reduction. I might have preferred that the number should be fifteen thousand instead of ten thousand; but I am ready to sustain the report of the committee, though I hope the amendment which I have proposed will be adopted by the Senate, and that the example will be followed by the House of Representatives. Then the mechanical reports, hereafter to be made, will be, by the appropriate officers, condensed and put in proper form, and we shall have a volume not exceeding seven hundred and fifty pages; which, I think, will be all that will be necessary, and be of infinitely more use, even to the sections of the country where the work is regarded as of great value.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to return my thanks to the Committee on Printing for the judicious effort which they are making to limit the expenditures which have heretofore been so wasteful. They are striking in the right place, in my opinion, when they strike at these books, which cost a great deal not merely in printing them, but also in the agencies which are necessary to collect the materials. I think that if, in addition to limiting the number of copies printed, they would accept another suggestion which has been made, and restrict the number of pages, they would do a good thing; and if they will only carry out the work they have commenced, and restrain this enormous publication of books, which has entailed on us an expenditure that is now attracting the public regard everywhere, I think they will do a great service to the country. I shall vote with great pleasure for the motion of the Committee on Printing as presented by the chairman; and I hope he will accept the other suggestion that has been made, and limit the quantity of matter to be printed.

Mr. MASON. I agree entirely with my colleague in recognizing the steps taken by the Committee on Printing in diminishing the cost of printing by reducing the number; but I should be gratified to go one step further, and to print nothing at all of the Patent Office report—not one line. I do not believe we shall ever get at the true disease in this matter until we extirpate the system altogether. If we refuse to print, then it will be proper for us to take away from the Department the duties which devolve on it now to compose the matter for printing.

The Patent Office report is a paper which is much sought for in my country by the agricultural community, and it is said to contain to them, with a great deal of trash, now and then valuable matter; and it is very natural that it should be sought for, because it is not only given to them gratuitously, but carried to them without cost. I do not believe that the people of any part of the United States, who would be interested in any printed document, would not very cheerfully pay (they can well afford to pay) whatever it may cost to acquire it. I think that the public mind would not only be satisfied, but would be gratified, if this gratuity—a very strange gratuity it is—should be discontinued on the part of Congress. I do not know that the motion will carry, but I think we had better meet it at the threshold, and stop the printing altogether of the Patent Office report, and, in due time, the printing of other things that may come before us, if we should think it advisable to do so. I do not know any better mode to attain it than by moving to postpone, indefinitely, the consideration of the resolution and amendment, and I make that motion.

Mr. GWIN. This nuisance of printing books has grown to be almost intolerable; but I do not think the Senator from Virginia has struck on the right plan to accomplish a beneficial object. According to my view, this report ought to be printed; but the mode of distribution should be changed. I think it should devolve on the Departments of the Government, and not on members of Congress. I do not know how it is with others, but really I am borne down by applications for books, seeds, and things of that sort, and if I do not send them to every one who applies to me, it is a cause of personal offense. The Senator from Pennsylvania has said correctly, that if we send a book to one person in a neighborhood, those who do not get it think they are cheated out of their books. If we print this report, and have it distributed by the Departments, they will take more pains to distribute it so as to be useful, than members of Congress possibly can. I hope, therefore, that he will not insist on his motion to prevent the printing; but will frame an amendment providing that when printed, it shall be distributed by a Department of the Government. Probably, the Interior Department is the best one. I shall not vote against printing this document, for I think it valuable, and it may be useful; but I believe there is great abuse in the manner of distribution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I differ entirely with the Senator from California in the suggestion he has made. I know there are inconveniences in reference to this matter; but there is no other mode, and he will allow me to say, no other possible mode, in which the agricultural report, and even this one, can be so understandingly distributed as by the members of Congress. It is perfectly idle to say that the head of the Department of the Interior would know how to distribute these books understandingly to the people all over the United States. The object that we seek for here—economy—would not be promoted, I think, by any such measure as that, because the result of sending the distribution to the Department of the Interior will probably be the creation of a new bureau; or, at any rate, the employment of a dozen, or fifteen, or twenty clerks for the purpose of distributing documents—a business which we do now without charge. I admit that the whole matter is exceedingly troublesome. I admit, further, that no member of Congress gains anything, but, on the contrary, loses, so far as popularity is concerned, by this labor which he is obliged to perform; but yet, so long as Congress chooses to print these books and order their distribution, I am perfectly satisfied that there is no way in which they can be distributed for the benefit of the community so well as by the members themselves, who know the particular individuals in their districts who would be benefited by them. I hope, therefore, that that idea will not prevail at all in the Senate; and at present I am hardly disposed to go as far as the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] suggests, by refusing to print these books at all. I do not know but that it would be wise eventually; but I am not quite prepared to come to that conclusion. I agree, however, fully with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing, and with the report of the committee, that we ought to reduce the number of this particular work, and, I have no doubt, of many other books that we print. I once had the honor to belong to the Committee on Printing, and I am very well aware of the great difficulties which that committee have always met with in endeavoring to reduce the expenses of the Government in this particular. I suppose, in the ordinary course of things, I might have been a member of that committee again. I do not know that I committed any offense which would deprive me of the position; but I declined to be a member of the committee again, and for this reason more than any other: I found that whatever conclusions the committee came to, after sober investigation and careful deliberation in the direction of economy, and recommended to the Senate, they almost uniformly failed to have adopted, if a particular Senator wanted to carry a particular scheme. We made our reports, recommending economy by reducing the number of copies to be printed, changing the style of a work, or something of that kind; but it was very seldom that we could get any support from gentlemen in the Senate, who were loud, generally, upon the subject of retrenchment and economy, when we came to a practical application of their doctrines.

Now, sir, it appears that the committee are making another attempt. I am very glad of it. They shall have my support in any attempt they may make to retrench our printing expenditures, unless, in my judgment, they make it in a wrong direction; and I think they can hardly fail to find the right one—can hardly fail to find a direction of retrenchment which will be wrong. Well, sir, in regard to this particular report, I approve of the suggestion made by my friend from Massachusetts to limit the quantity of the matter; but he will allow me to say to him that he cannot carry out his amendment, as I think, in precisely the form which he has proposed. For instance, the style of printing this work, he will observe, and the Senate will observe, is different from that formerly adopted. There is a great deal more of it; the plates are expensive; they are printed from wood-cuts, as they are called. Formerly all these drawings were introduced into the text and printed in the common style. You could not have a work of that degree of perfection which is considered to be important, printed in the text in the same manner that you print the text itself, in my judgment; but I may be in error about that.

The only mode in which we can accomplish the result of reducing the quantity of matter, is to give a specific direction that a selection shall be made so as to make up a volume of only one particular description, and you must give also a particular direction with regard to the style; and that must be done probably under the direction of the committee after examination. I think, therefore, with great respect to my friend from Arkansas, the chairman of the committee, that at present the Senate is hardly in a condition understandingly to act on the proposition contained in the amendment as it is now before us. There should be some inquiries made with regard to the style in which the work is to be done—the manner in which it is to be executed. On consultation with artists and others familiar with the subject, the committee can easily ascertain what is best to be done; and any conclusion they come to in regard to limiting the extent of the work, bringing it down to the lowest possible limit, I shall sustain. I think the object of such a selection should be to afford to the community information of what is done at the Patent Office, and the course of improvement in arts and manufactures in this country. I am satisfied that the number of copies we now print is altogether too large. From my own State, I receive letters almost every day in reference to these books, from persons, the style of whose letters show that they write for them simply because they have heard of the book, and they want to look at it. It is of no sort of benefit to them. I believe there is not one person in ten, to whom we send these books indiscriminately, who ever reads them. If you send them to intelligent mechanics, (and there are many such in my part of the country,) they read them and benefit by them, because they study them and understand them. In regard to the agricultural report, I am not so good a judge, but I believe Congress has gone altogether too far in the very large number of that report they print. However, of that I will not pretend to judge so much as of this.

I wish to say one other thing; and that is, that the large expense of printing has been incurred, in a very great degree, by these books; and if the Senate will adhere to the resolution adopted by a vote which was taken at the last Congress, that it will print no more reports of exploring expeditions, no more drawings of natural history, no more of these birds, insects, and reptiles, of which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] spoke, we shall save more than one half of the whole expense of printing. The enormous expenditures that have been piled up during the last two Congresses, have risen almost entirely from the printing of these large books. We have now stopped that. I hope we shall adhere to that determination. If we stop all that unnecessary printing, and confine ourselves to the mere reports of our Departments, and the report of the Patent Office, which is connected with the Interior Department, and the report of the Coast Survey, which is beneficial, and have a reasonable limitation as to the number of copies, and take some little pains in reference to the contracts that are made, so that they do not cost us double what they ought to cost, we may reduce the expenses within a very short period to a reasonable limit.

But the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] will allow me to say that after all, when you have reduced these expenses to the smallest limit, and yet afford all the information that can be afforded by means of printing which ought to be done, you will have begun, and only begun, to stop the very great leak in the Treasury. I should like to hear Senators talk as much and feel as much in regard to, and show the same disposition to examine into, the enormous expenditures of money for useless purposes, by the creation of new offices, and the appointment of new officers, particularly in the Post Office Department. New post routes are created which are not necessary, in my judgment, and in the judgment of many others; and mail service is increased where it is not needed, and in a thousand other ways, that Department costs more than it has been, or ever will be, able to pay. I should like to have gentlemen look into the great expenditures of that Department for advertising purposes, and for every other purpose which is not looked into, simply because there are so many claimants on the Treasury.

Since I have been in Congress we have had a very important committee in name—the Committee on Retrenchment. I believe it existed for two Congresses, while I have been here; but it has now been abolished, and it might well be. Who ever heard of any movement made by that committee to do one single thing in any way in reference to decreasing the expenditure of money? I am willing to begin somewhere, and I am willing to begin here, on this printing matter. I hope those Senators who are able to reach, and can get at, the fountains of information, and control the matter, will look a little further, and see if they cannot restrain enormous expenditures elsewhere. I will go with the honorable Senator from Arkansas in his movements on this subject, I think, as far as he will go himself—to the very verge, almost, of prohibition in these matters; but I wish to reserve myself now on some particular points, in reference to books of this description, where I think the information is absolutely needed, and where, if we refuse it, we might as well abolish the Departments themselves.

Mr. BROWN. I like very much the course that this discussion has taken; but I feel very apprehensive that it will end where all such discussions have ended heretofore—in nothing. We commence with an honest and good purpose to reform; and after we have tried it once or twice, our exertions seem suddenly to give out, and we do nothing. We had the same subject under consideration at the last session, and it is here again. Why? It is because we do not strike at the root of the evil. If you will abolish the franking privilege, you will get clear of these books, and you never will get clear of them in any other way. Supply members of Congress for the purposes of official correspondence, with stamped envelopes, have no franking privilege at all, and then you will get clear of these books; but you will never get clear of them in any other way.

The books are utterly worthless, let gentlemen say what they please about them. Take the Patent Office report; let the Commissioner say to any publisher in the Union: "Here, take the manuscript prepared, and have a copyright;" there is not a man in the whole Union fool enough to publish it with a copyright. As evidence that your books are of no account, you take no copyright for them; yet who ever republished one of them? Did you ever hear of such a thing? Nobody trespasses on your rights, and yet you do not cover them by any law. I think no argument could be more conclusive as to the utter worthlessness of these books than that they are not published by anybody but yourselves. It seems to me it is precisely because a book is of no account that Congress publishes it. If it were of any account, somebody else would want to publish it. If you were to take these volumes and send them to depots in the several States, and propose to sell them for the actual cost of the paper, they would lie there to all eternity; nobody would pay for them the cost of the paper on which they are printed.

After all, the constituent of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that simple-minded, honest-hearted old Pennsylvanian—I dare say he was a Dutchman—was not so far mistaken. Why, sir, you do publish books for children. What are all your picture books, but books to amuse children? What is the use of volumes crammed full of pictures of birds, snakes, lizards, and all manner of things of that sort, printed in the most artistic style, with pretty little stories about the habits of the birds, snakes, and reptiles, but as mere play books? They are not printed for men; because they contain no information that would be of any value to a man with a beard upon his face, or a woman who was fit to be the mother of children. They are mere playthings got up at an enormous expense to the Government. Take your books about the exploring expedition; and instead of giving a history of the expedition you find the queerest pictures, and most outlandish things meaning nothing, no historical statement that amounts to anything. There is one volume of this exploring expedition, the queerest book that ever was put inside of lids. Take a box of common shoe blacking, and a brush, and a little white paper, smear it all over, and then take a pepper-box of white sand and sprinkle it all about, and you will have as good a book as that. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. I do not mean to controvert what he asserts at all; but as he is merely on an argument that relates to the general subject, and, as I believe from the spirit manifested here this morning, we can dispose of the subject, I shall be exceedingly obliged to him if he will let us have a vote. I trust we shall vote, and no further discussion now.

Mr. BROWN. Very well; I give way.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to suggest an amendment to my amendment, which I believe will do away with the objection of the Senator from Maine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present question is on the motion for the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope that motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not withdraw it. I should like to record my vote in its favor.

Mr. MASON. And I should like to record mine; but I want to get at the object in a manner that is probably attainable. I withdraw the motion on the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON,] who will then move to strike out the eight thousand copies for the Senate, so as to print only two thousand for the Department.

Mr. IVERSON. I want to make that motion as soon as I can get an opportunity, but I believe it is not in order at this stage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend it by striking out the words, "in their proper places," so that these illustrations can be put in any portion of the volume by themselves.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is but one remedy for this evil, which I have been endeavoring to counteract myself for the last ten years, and that is to go back to the principle of publishing nothing except what is necessary for the body. That is the only remedy, unless the one suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, which is a good one, and would be equally effective, be adopted. If you could abolish the franking privilege, that would be a desirable thing. The mails are now lumbered up by your documents to such an extent as to be an enormous inconvenience to everybody. During the recess, I know I had to send to our village postmaster a two-horse wagon all the time to get my mail. I presume that is the history of all of us. A gentleman would have to enlarge his house almost to bring in his documents. It takes almost as many rooms for my documents as it does for my small family. They are multiplied for no object but to give jobs to printers. I am glad the Committee on Printing have struck at the evil; but they do not go half far enough. Let us go back to the true principle at once.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senate will not do it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Print nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Move it, and try it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then I move to strike out all except what is necessary for the Senate.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am not aware that such a motion would be in order. I am altogether opposed to this printing, in every form. I desire to strike at the root of the evil. I regret very much that the Senator from Virginia has withdrawn his motion for the indefinite postponement. I renew that motion, as I wish to record, at any rate, my vote against this whole system of printing; and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. Before the vote is taken, I wish to state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOWD] has left the Chamber on account of sickness, and I have agreed to pair off with him on all contested questions; but I presume he would vote with me on this question. He left the matter in my discretion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the indefinite postponement of the resolution, resulted—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Brown, Clay, Dixon, Evans, Fitch, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Mason, Pugh, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, and Yulee—16.
NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, King, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wilson—26.

So the motion was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. With the unanimous consent of the Senate I should be glad to have the vote taken now on the resolution. I think we shall have no further debate. If we put it off until to-morrow it will consume the morning hour, perhaps, and we may not have the vote taken for a month. I hope we shall dispose of it now. ["Agreed, agreed."]

Mr. STUART. I wish to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts by striking out the descriptive part, so that it will simply direct the Commissioner to make a volume to consist of six hundred pages, and let him use his discretion as to how he will make it.

Mr. WILSON. Let the Secretary read the amendment as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

And that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents on mechanics, hereafter to be made to the Senate, to be prepared and submitted in such manner as that the plates and drawings necessary to illustrate each subject shall be inserted so as to comprise the entire report in one volume.

Mr. STUART. I move to strike out the intermediate language and say "to comprise one volume not to exceed six hundred pages." The words I move to strike out are: "in such manner as that the plates and drawings necessary to illustrate each subject shall be inserted" and to add after the word "volume" "not to exceed six hundred pages."

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he will attain his object by letting the amendment stand as it is. I am willing to limit it to seven or eight hundred pages. The illustrations make six hundred pages of the seventeen hundred and fifty printed now. I think the whole can be included in a volume of about seven hundred and fifty or eight hundred pages. Here is the first volume of the message of the President making eight hundred pages. I think it is all included within eight hundred pages; and we want the illustrations in the volume; probably they will be put at the close of the volume. I think the Senator had better withdraw his amendment, and provide that the work shall not exceed eight hundred pages.

Mr. STUART. I will adopt that suggestion. I will withdraw my amendment if the Senator will add to his amendment a proviso that it shall not exceed eight hundred pages.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to propose another amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; and that is that the reform commence with the present document. I want to begin this year.

Mr. WILSON. The report is written already.

Mr. CAMERON. I will show you how it can be done. Here are four hundred or five hundred pages containing a list of patents granted. That list forms a whole volume which is entirely useless. Just permit the Committee on Printing and the Superintendent of Public Printing to act together, and they will curtail it in such a way as to make a useful book without all this useless matter.

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that as the report has been made this year, we had better stand by the resolution of the committee and let it pass now, providing for the future. The report for this year has been written. I suppose it will amount to seventeen or eighteen hundred pages when printed. Let us print this report, but with this amendment, which will guide the Department in the future. If we undertake to do too much we probably shall do nothing. I go for the report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw my suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified. In order that there may be no mistake in reference to the amendment between the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read it as follows:

And that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby directed, to cause the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents on mechanics, hereafter to be made to the Senate, to be prepared and submitted in such manner, as that the plates and drawings necessary to illustrate each subject, shall be inserted so as to comprise the entire report in one volume not to exceed eight hundred pages.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to amend that by striking out "eight hundred pages" and inserting "six hundred and fifty pages." Eight hundred pages would make a cumbersome volume, which would be difficult to transmit in the mails.

Mr. WILSON. The first volume of the message is eight hundred pages, and it is not out of the way in size. It will be pretty hard to comprise this report in eight hundred pages.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Very well; let it go.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate. Is this a joint resolution? ["No."] Then the result will be that the Patent Office will send one volume here and four to the House of Representatives. ["No."]

Mr. WILSON. The other House will follow our example, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If our action related only to the volume before us, there might be some force in the suggestion of my friend from Georgia; but this resolution relates to reports hereafter to be made; and I think we may feel very well assured that the Interior Department, unless some intimation is given by the House of Representatives that they do not concur with us, will make but one report to each House. The one to us necessarily is restricted, and consists of material culled from the vast mass of matter before them, and that will be the only report they will make. It will be made to both branches.

Mr. CAMERON. The Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, I am satisfied, are disposed to act with the committee of this body. The committees have met together once or twice, and talked over the subject. If we begin the reform here, they will carry it out there.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to strike out that part of the resolution which provides for printing eight thousand copies for distribution by the members of the Senate. I am willing to let the Patent Office have two thousand to distribute, because they know to whom these books will be useful better than the Senate, and two thousand can be appropriated to them for that purpose. I think it is a perfect waste of money to give Senators eight thousand copies for distribution. I have now seven hundred volumes lying in the post office at Columbus, Georgia, where I reside, and I do not know how to dispose of them. I saw, last summer, in a little trip I made to Arkansas, more than twenty large bags of books lying in a post office in the country for General Rust, a Representative from that State. It very nearly resulted in cutting me out of my trip; and I swore then, in my vengeance, that I would not vote a dollar for printing hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not think the Senator ought to vote for printing these volumes, if he allows seven hundred of them to be undistributed. As to those in Arkansas, I distribute them as fast as they come to me.

Mr. IVERSON. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. The resolution proposes to print ten thousand—two thousand for the Interior Department, and eight thousand for the Senate; that is over and above fourteen hundred and twenty, which is the usual number printed for the use of the Senate. I want to get rid of the eight thousand extra copies intended to be for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands the motion.

Mr. BIGLER. I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if he can give the Senate some idea of the amount of money which will be saved by the motion of the Senator from Georgia? The printing of two thousand copies, it will be observed, will cost the entire amount of the composition. After we have paid for the composition, the cost of the additional volumes will be a very small proportion of the expenditure.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will answer the Senator. About $16,000 will be saved by that motion. The cost of the two thousand copies for the Department would be about $4,000; the cost of the regular number would be $11,000 more; making $15,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very sorry to disagree with my friend from Georgia; but I can suggest an expedient that, perhaps, would relieve the local post offices from the incumbrance of these documents. It has been my habit to distribute them here direct, and to send them in parcels to the State of Texas. I do not rely on their being sent to me at home, where I am surrounded by the cares of business, to distribute them. It would be inconvenient there; but here it is very convenient, if they are sent to members in their quarters, to distribute them, and they go directly to the different persons to whom they are directed. I have received from the remotest parts of Texas, bordering on the Rio Grande, acknowledgments of the receipt of the Patent Office report for last year, either the agricultural or the mechanical por-
